EXPLANATION

THE object in view in preparing Corpus Juris Secundum has been two-fold. First, to provide a complete encyclopedic treatment of the whole body of the law, which means that it must be based upon all the reported cases; Second, to present each title of the law in form and content most suitable as a means of practical reference for the Bench and Bar

Corpus Juris Secundum is therefore a complete restatement of the entire body of American Law. The clear-cut and exhaustive propositions comprising the text are supported by all the authorities from the earliest times to date. The supporting case citations, conspicuously set out in the notes, point to all decisions handed down since the publication of Corpus Juris. When the searcher may wish to consult earlier authorities, a specific reference to Corpus Juris makes available all cases back to 1658.

Each title is preceded by a complete section analysis, greatly simplified to facilitate research. Where the scope of any section is such as to require it, a more minute analysis is found thereunder in its appropriate place within the title (see Abatement and Revival, Section 112). The convenience of this method—an innovation in encyclopedic writing—must immediately commend itself.

A concise black-letter summary, indicative of its scope, precedes the full treatment or statement of the law under each section. These introductory summaries, concise and free from interlineation of authorities, have proven of great convenience and value in legal research.

An index is found in the back of each volume covering the titles contained therein, thus providing another convenient means of ready access to the text and notes.

Corpus Juris Secundum is kept to date by means of annual cumulative pocket parts for each volume. This feature of supplementation which has proved so successful in modern digests and statutes conveniently, and with certainty, keeps each title constantly to date through current cases and new precedents.

Corpus Juris Secundum represents the combined product of the highest editorial talent and manufacturing skill. Its many excellent editorial features are fittingly accompanied by corresponding innovations and improvements in mechanical arrangement, typography, and design, which the publisher believes will commend themselves to the profession as representing a new standard in legal publications.

H. ACTIONS

1. IN GENERAL

§ 482. In General

At common law a servant's action against his master for a personal injury generally is an action based on negligence. The enactment of an employers' liability act usually does not abolish the servant's right of action against the master whether the right is one previously enforceable at common law or by virtue of another statute.

Generally at common law a servant's action against his master for a personal injury is for negligence,⁹⁸ and, in the absence of any controlling statutory provision, the servant's right of action, if any, is one at common law.⁹⁹ The enactment of an employers' liability act does not ordinarily abolish a right of action by a servant against his master for negligence, whether the right is one previously enforceable at common law,¹ or by virtue of some other statute.² The servant may enforce a liability created by statute, even though the injury was sustained under such circumstances that he could have maintained his action at common law,³ or under another subdivision of the same statute;⁴ but a cause of action under one provision of a statute cannot also be set out as a separate cause under another and distinct provision.⁵ Plaintiff may rest his suit on one of several statutes, or on both, if either or both support the action.⁶

The statutory remedy, however, supersedes the common-law remedy as to all matters particularly mentioned in the statute or exclusively governed thereby,⁷ and no other notice that the action is brought under the statute is necessary than to allege facts bringing the case within it.⁸ If the statute is unconstitutional, an action, in so far as it seeks to recover thereunder, is not, of course, maintainable.⁹ An action may be maintained under a statute in force at the time of the injury, even though the statute, as subsequently revised, does not preserve a remedy for injuries occurring under the former act.¹⁰ A statutory right of action is not taken away or in any way affected by a provision imposing a penalty for the violation of the statute.¹¹

Where the pleadings are applicable to a recovery either, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act or at common law, plaintiff is not necessarily required to elect at the beginning of the trial to seek recovery either under such act or at common law.¹² Plaintiff's election at the trial, however, to base his cause of action on a common-law duty of defend-

Breach of duty

In the case of trespass actions for disease or injury from exposure due to the employer's negligence or violation of a statutory duty, it is the breach of the employer's duty which constitutes the "cause of action" and the disease is but the consequential damage—McIntyre v E J Lavino & Co., 25 A.2d 168, 344 Pa. 163.

board and clothed it with authority to prescribe standard conditions of labor for women in industries to which employers must conform, since neither the statute nor the state board created by the statute had prescribed standard conditions of labor for women in industry to which particular employer must conform—Thoman v. Farmers & Bankers Life Ins Co., supra.

§ 483. Conditions Precedent

Notice of injury and return of money received after injury as conditions precedent are discussed infra §§ 484, 485.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 484. — Return of Money Received after Injury

The injured employee is not bound under all circumstances to return payments received from the employer after the injury was sustained, as a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action.

Unless accepted in compromise of his claim, a servant is not bound, as a condition precedent to his right of action, to return money received for wages and medical attention after the accident.¹⁴

§ 485. — Notice of Injury

- a. General considerations
- b. Waiver or estoppel
- c. Form and sufficiency
- d. Service
- e. Variance

a. General Considerations

Some statutes require the giving of a notice of injury within a prescribed time as a condition precedent to a right of action under the statutes.

Some employers' liability acts require a notice of injury to be given within a prescribed time after the injury as a condition precedent to a right of action under the statute,¹⁵ but such a statutory provision has no application to injuries occurring before it took effect.¹⁶ The requirements of the employers' liability acts apply only to those cases which lie outside the common law and within the statute, or to a case in which a servant, although he has a remedy at common law, relies on the statute alone;¹⁷ but under a general statute providing that no action for injury to a person shall be maintained unless notice of the injury is given, such notice is a condition precedent to a common-law action by an employee against his employer for injuries caused by the latter's negligence.¹⁸

Under a statutory provision excusing failure to give notice within the prescribed time if from physical or mental incapacity it is impossible to do so, mere physical incapacity to give the notice personally is not sufficient excuse if the injured employee is able to give notice through another and is mentally capable of so doing.¹⁹ Failure formally to offer in evidence a notice properly served will not defeat recovery.²⁰

Contract requirement of notice. A provision in the contract of employment requiring notice of injury to be given within a specified time will be enforced,²¹ but such a provision is ineffective and unenforceable if it is in conflict with some constitutional or statutory provision.²² The validity of such a provision is governed by the law of the place where the injury occurs.²³ If the contract provides that it may terminate at the option of either party, the adoption of a constitutional provision making any such contract void abrogates a contract previ-

Construction and operation of particular statute

(1) In an action by an employee against his employer, it has been held that a loading platform maintained by the employer constituted "premises" within meaning of statute requiring a person injured because of a defect in premises consisting in part of snow or ice thereon to notify owner of premises of such injury prior to bringing action and within a specified time after injury.—Whalen v. Railway Exp Agency, Mass., 73 NE2d 740.

(2) Such statute is not limited to snow or ice appearing at place of injury through natural causes and applies where employee stepped on a piece of ice which was present on a loading platform as the result of loading operation.—Whalen v. Railway Exp Agency, supra.

ously made where the injury occurs after the adoption of the constitution.²⁴

b. Waiver or Estoppel

The right to notice of injury may be lost by estoppel or waiver.

The right to the statutory notice may be lost by estoppel or waiver,²⁵ and failure to make timely objection constitutes a waiver of the notice.²⁶ A contract provision for notice may also be waived,²⁷ and no consideration is necessary to support a waiver.²⁸

c. Form and Sufficiency

The notice of injury must state the particulars required with reasonable definiteness and completeness, and usually the notice must be in writing.

The notice of injury must state all the particulars required by the statute, such as the time, place, and cause of the injury, with reasonable definiteness and completeness,²⁹ although technical precision is not required.³⁰ A notice which states merely a common-law liability does not enlarge plaintiff's rights or extend defendant's liability beyond that imposed by the common law.³¹ Usually the notice of injury must be in writing.³²

Commencement of action as notice. The view has been taken that the commencement of an action under an employers' liability act within the period prescribed, and the filing of a complaint setting out the required facts, constitute a sufficient compliance with the requirement of notice,³³ and a like rule has been applied with respect to a contract provision for notice.³⁴ According to some cases, however, the giving of the statutory notice must precede the writ or commencement of the action, as shown infra subdivision d of this section. A complaint in a common-law action discontinued by plaintiff is not a sufficient notice to entitle him to recover in a subsequent action under the statute.³⁵

Signature. The notice must be signed by plaintiff or by some one in his behalf duly authorized by him,³⁶ but it is not necessary that the notice should state expressly that it is signed in behalf of plaintiff if such intent can reasonably be inferred from its language.³⁷

Effect of defects. Under some statutes a defect or inaccuracy in a notice of injury which does not prejudice defendant, and which is not for the purpose of misleading him, will not vitiate the notice.³⁸ Thus, a notice which is merely inaccurate in giving some detail will not defeat the action where defendant is not misled,³⁹ as where he or his representative had actual knowledge of the facts;⁴⁰ but the statute does not excuse an entire omission to state some substantial fact,⁴¹ even though defendant had knowledge of such fact apart from the notice.⁴² If the complaint is broad enough to embrace a common-law as well as a statutory liability, the court may treat the case as at common law, and defects in the notice sufficient to defeat an action under the statute will be no defense.⁴³

Waiver of defects. Defects and irregularities in the notice of injury may be waived.⁴⁴ By the express terms of some statutes, if the notice is insufficient, failure to demand further notice within a specified time after service of the original notice waives all defects therein.⁴⁵ Under a statute providing that, where a notice is defective defendant may, within a specified time after service thereof, demand a further or amended notice, an amended notice supersedes the original notice⁴⁶ as far as it is inconsistent therewith.⁴⁷ Plaintiff may begin his action as soon as the original notice is served,⁴⁸ and need not discontinue and commence a new action after the service of the amended notice.⁴⁹

Generally the notice of injury must be served in the manner and within the time prescribed.

The notice of injury must be served in the manner⁵⁰ and within the time⁵¹ prescribed, unless reasonable excuse is shown for delay.⁵² According to some cases the giving of the statutory notice must precede the writ or commencement of the action.⁵³ The notice must be given by plaintiff or his agent⁵⁴ to defendant or his duly authorized agent.⁵⁵

An admission of service of notice is insufficient proof of service where there is no proof of the contents of the notice or of the date of service.⁵⁶

e. Variance

The evidence at the trial must conform to the facts stated in the notice of injury where the action is based solely on an employers' liability act.

Where the action is brought solely under the employers' liability act, the evidence on the trial must conform to the facts stated in the notice of injury,⁵⁷ and a substantial variance between the notice and proof will defeat recovery.⁵⁸ Where a notice was addressed to defendant and alleged that on the date of plaintiff's injury he was in defendant's employ as a street car conductor, he could not claim on the trial that the evidence showed that he was employed by a certain railway company other than defendant, and that there was no evidence that such company and defendant were identical.⁵⁹

§ 486. Jurisdiction and Venue

Generally a state court may acquire jurisdiction of an action for an injury to an employee which occurred in another state. Various state courts have jurisdiction of actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, and the state practice determines the venue of such an action in a state court.

While an action for injury to an employee is transitory, and a state court has generally jurisdiction of such an action, notwithstanding the injury occurred in another state, if jurisdiction of defendant is duly obtained,⁶⁰ questions of jurisdiction and venue in actions by servants against their masters for personal injuries are sometimes governed by special statutory provisions.⁶¹ Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 56, plaintiff has a choice with respect to certain courts in which an action under the act may be brought.⁶² Under such act certain state courts have jurisdiction,⁶³ including a competent court of the state in which defendant resides,⁶⁴ in which the action arose,⁶⁵ or in which defendant is doing business.⁶⁶ While the act does not give an absolute right to sue in the courts of any state where jurisdiction over defendant may be obtained,⁶⁷ generally a state court which has jurisdiction may not refuse to exercise it.⁶⁸ The act does not enlarge the jurisdiction of the state court over the person of defendant carrier to an extent greater than that conferred by the state.⁶⁹ The venue of actions in state courts under the act is left to the practice of the forum.⁷⁰

Concurrent jurisdiction of state and federal courts of actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act is discussed generally in Courts § 526.

§ 487. Time to Sue and Limitations

a. General considerations

b. Computation of statutory period

a. General Considerations

An action based on an employers' liability act must be commenced within the time prescribed by such act. Generally the limitation in such acts relates not merely to the remedy but is a condition of liability created by the statute.

Where an employers' liability act prescribes the time for commencing actions arising thereunder, an action based on such act must be brought within the time so limited.⁷¹ The limitation in such acts relates not merely to the remedy, but operates as a condition of liability.⁷² There have been broad

Federal Employers' Liability Act construed

(1) The provision of such act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 55, that any contract, rule, regulation, or device, intended to enable a common carrier to exempt itself from liability under the act shall to that extent be void did not operate to restore the injured employee's rights which had been lost by failure to bring action within the statutory period, in a case in which the employee and the employer railroad company had entered into compensation agreement under a state workmen's compensation act—Damiano v. Pennsylvania R Co., CCA Pa., 161 F.2d 534.

(2) A street railroad company in the District of Columbia was not a common carrier by railroad within the meaning of the Federal Employers' Liability Act of 1908, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 51-60, and, therefore, the limitation of two years fixed by such act did not apply, and the statutory period of limitations applicable in such case was the period of one year fixed by the Federal Employers' Liability Act of 1906—Mangum v. Capital Traction Co., 39 F.2d 286, 59 App D.C. 241.

statements to the effect that there cannot be a waiver of such a statute,⁷³ and verbal promises and acts by the employer which might ordinarily constitute an estoppel do not prevent the operation of the statute.⁷⁴ Thus a failure to commence the action within the statutory period cannot be excused by showing a breach of an agreement by the employer to provide employment and care for the injured employee in consideration of his not bringing suit,⁷⁵ especially where such excuse is not seasonably presented.⁷⁶

The limitation prescribed by the statute will not bar the action if the action is one at common law,⁷⁷ or plaintiff's pleading shows that the statute containing the limitations is not applicable.⁷⁸ Such statutes are not retroactive,⁷⁹ and an amendment extending the period of limitation will not affect actions pending at the time of the amendment, and which were already barred under the original act.⁸⁰

Subject to certain qualifications the period of limitations commences to run under some employers' liability acts from the date of injury, and is not tolled by fraud or by personal disability of the injured employee. Under some acts an amendment of plaintiff's original pleading which does not state a new cause of action may relate back to the time of the commencement of the action without regard to the intervening lapse of time.

In an action by an injured employee under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, generally the cause of action accrues and the statutory limitation commences to run on the date of the injury,⁸¹ and not on the date when the result of the injury becomes apparent,⁸² but in an action under such act for disability caused by an occupational disease resulting from the employer's violation of the Federal Boiler Inspection Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 23, the period of limitation commences to run when the employee becomes disabled or incapacitated as a result of the disease,⁸³ although it has also been held that the date when the period of limitation commences to run is not necessarily postponed until the date on which the employee or his physician ascertains the particular disease with which the employee is afflicted.⁸⁴

The limitation provision of the Federal Employers' Liability Act is not tolled or extended by fraud or concealment which prevents plaintiff from bringing the action within the statutory period,⁸⁵ nor is such provision tolled by the fact that the injured employee entered into a compensation agreement with the employer under a state workmen's compensation act.⁸⁶ Also, it is not tolled by reason of a personal disability⁸⁷ as, for example, in the case of disability of infancy⁸⁸ or insanity.⁸⁹

Commencement of action. There is a sufficient commencement of an action to satisfy the limitation provision of the Federal Employers' Liability Act where process has been adequate to bring in the parties and to start the case on a course of judicial handling which may lead to final judgment without the issuance of new initial process,⁹⁰ as, for example, where an action is instituted by service of process issued out of a state court which is without power to proceed to final judgment, if the state law or practice directs or permits the transfer of the cause by change of venue or otherwise to a court which has jurisdiction to hear, try, and otherwise determine the cause.⁹¹ However, the fact that the injured employee and the employer have entered into a compensation agreement under a state workmen's compensation act does not constitute commencement of the action.⁹²

Where the allegations of plaintiff's original pleading state facts authorizing recovery under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, an amendment of such pleading after the elapse of the period of limitations prescribed by such act, which does not state a new cause of action, is permissible and relates back to the commencement of the action without regard to the intervening lapse of time,⁹³ as, for example, where the amendment merely expands or amplifies what has been alleged in the original pleading.⁹⁴ The rule is otherwise, however, as to an attempted amendment introducing a new cause of action which was not set up in the original pleading, after the period of limitation prescribed by such act has elapsed.⁹⁵

The Federal Transportation Act of February 28, 1920, § 206 (f) declaring that the period of federal control of the railroads should not be computed as a part of the period of limitations in actions against carriers, did not revive an action brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, and which had become extinguished before the passage of the Transportation Act by expiration of the statutory period.⁹⁶

The general rule that, in case of a joint tort, plaintiff may join as defendants the joint tort-feasors applies in an action by a servant for personal injuries.

A person not included in the class to be benefited by a statute generally does not have the right to sue for a violation of such statute.⁹⁷ The general rule that in case of a joint tort plaintiff may join all of the joint tort-feasors applies to an action by a servant to recover for personal injuries,⁹⁸ and the rule may apply even where the master's liability is statutory, while that of the servants is imposed by common law.⁹⁹

If there is no joint liability, a joinder of the parties is erroneous.¹

It has been held that, in an action against a railroad company under a state employers' liability act, another railroad company whose concurrent negligence is alleged to have contributed to the injury is improperly joined,² and that in an action by a servant, who was in the employment of two railroad companies at a point where they used a common track, and who was injured while performing a duty for one of the companies only, disconnected from any service performed for the other, the latter is not a proper party defendant.³ However, a railroad company which has purchased the road of another company, and which has assumed the payment of all claims against the vendor company, is properly joined as a codefendant with the vendor in an action for personal injuries sustained by a servant while in the employ of the latter.⁴ Where it appears from the evidence that a lessee is but an agent of the owner, a recovery for an injury to a servant employed in or about the property may be had of the owner.⁵

party. The presence of a superfluous defendant will not prevent a servant from obtaining such relief as he is entitled to against the proper defendant.⁶ Knowledge on the part of the actual employer that the injured employee has sued the wrong person as employer is not of itself sufficient to substitute the actual employer as a party to the action.⁷

2. PLEADING

§ 489. Declaration, Petition, or Complaint

- a. General principles
- b. Statement of cause of action generally
- c. Performance of conditions precedent
- d. Negating applicability of, and recovery under, Workmen's Compensation Act

a. General Principles

The declaration or complaint in an action by a servant for injuries should plead facts, and not conclusions, and the allegations must be consistent with one another and not duplicitous.

The general rules relating to the pleadings in civil actions are applicable to the declaration, petition, or complaint in an action by a servant against his master to recover for personal injuries.⁸ The allegations in the declaration or complaint must be consistent with one another,⁹ but in order to render the pleading bad the repugnancy must be such that proof of one state of facts as the basis for recovery will necessarily disprove another state of facts as such basis.¹⁰ Evidentiary facts need not be set out.¹¹ A complaint will be bad for duplicity,¹² but different statements of the cause of injury¹³ and different acts of negligence¹⁴ may be alleged.

Facts, and not conclusions, should be pleaded;¹⁵ but, if the fact is one concerning which the court takes judicial notice and which need not, therefore, be specially pleaded, it may, if pleaded, be stated as a legal conclusion.¹⁶ So, a conclusion in the pleading will be subject to special demurrer only where no facts are alleged to support it, or the specific facts alleged will not warrant the inference drawn.¹⁷ Mere surplusage will not vitiate the pleading.¹⁸

Demurrer to complaint. Questions which are peculiarly for the jury will not be determined on demurrer to the declaration or complaint,¹⁹ except in plain and undisputable cases.²⁰ Where it is doubtful, under the wording of the complaint, as to whether, when the proofs are in, a cause of action will have been made out, the court may, in its discretion, overrule a demurrer to the complaint, reserving its right to sustain a demurrer to the evidence at the trial.²¹

b. Statement of Cause of Action Generally

Although no express form of words is necessary, the declaration or complaint must set out with certainty and definiteness all the facts necessary to constitute a cause of action for injuries to a servant.

While no express form of words is necessary, the declaration or complaint must set out with certainty and definiteness all the facts necessary to constitute a cause of action²² sufficient to apprise a person of ordinary understanding of what he will be required to meet,²³ although the same degree of certainty is not required as to facts peculiarly within defendant's knowledge²⁴. The allegations must clearly show the existence of the relation of master and servant at the time of the injury,²⁵ and a pleading which alleges that plaintiff was employed by defendant's agent, instead of alleging that he was employed by defendant, is demurrable²⁶. On the other hand, it has been held that it is not necessary to state whether plaintiff was an employee or a trespasser.²⁷ It is not necessary, of course, to allege the relationship of the parties where the action is brought under a statute creating a liability irrespective of such relationship.²⁸

Plaintiff must also allege the nature and circumstances of the injury²⁹ in so far as they are material features of the negligence complained of,³⁰ the right of plaintiff to be where he was when in-

Continuing injury

Where the nature of the action is such that it embraces a substantial period of time, and the act complained of and the employment are continuous, plaintiff may allege facts material thereto regardless of how long before the statutory period of limitations they occurred—Hughes v Eureka Flint & Spar Co., 26 A 2d 567, 20 N J Misc 314

"Humanitarian" rule

Fact that amended petition in action arising out of intersectional automobile collision injuring servant used the words "in and approaching a place of danger," instead of "in and approaching a place of peril," was immaterial in determining whether humanitarian rule was applicable, since "danger" and "peril" meant the same thing, and the petition stated a cause of action under the rule—Hensley v. Dorr, Mo. App., 202 SW 2d 553

Several defendants

Where the writ, in an action for injuries to an employee, made two corporations parties defendant, and the declaration charged "the said defendant" with the ownership and operation of the railroad causing the injury, the declaration was demurrable by one of the corporations on the refusal of the court to dismiss the action as to the other.—Johnson v Bennington & N A. The declaration or complaint must allege the performance of any condition precedent to the right of action,³⁷ such as the giving of notice of injury,³⁸ in writing,³⁹ where such notice is a prerequisite.⁴⁰ It has been held that plaintiff's pleading must also state the date of service of notice,⁴¹ although some authorities have held that the date need not be alleged.⁴² Where the statute makes the bringing of the action within a specified time a condition of liability, plaintiff's pleading must allege that the action was brought within such time.⁴³ Where the limitation provision operates as a condition of liability, the defense of limitations may be raised by demurrer⁴⁴ and need not be specially pleaded.⁴⁵

(2) More specifically it has been stated that in an action under the act it is unnecessary to plead as a defense provision precluding maintenance of action more than specified time subsequent to accrual of cause of action provided sufficient facts appear to raise defense—Wichita Falls & S. R. Co. v. Durham, 120 S.W.2d 803, 132 Tex. 143, 120 A.L.R. 1497.

In some jurisdictions the complaint in an action by an employee for personal injuries need not allege that the employer had elected not to accept the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act⁴⁶ In other jurisdictions such fact must be alleged⁴⁷ in a case which would otherwise come within the act;⁴⁸ but it need not be alleged that the employee had or had not accepted the act, since the rejection by the employer precluded the former from the right of election.⁴⁹ The fact, however, that the employer's rejection of the provisions of the act is pleaded does not show a right of recovery by action, unless negligence on the part of defendant is also pleaded.⁵⁰ Where the injury was sustained in another state under circumstances which would have limited the employee to compensation provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act if the injury had occurred in the state of the forum, the complaint must show that the action could be maintained under the laws of the state where the accident occurred.⁵¹

Negating recovery under workmen's compensation act. In a common-law action for injuries to a servant the declaration or complaint need not allege that plaintiff has not recovered benefits under the Workmen's Compensation Act, that being a matter of defense for defendant to allege and prove.⁵²

§ 490. — Negligence of Master

- a. Duty owed to servant
- b. Acts constituting negligence or breach of duty in general
- c. Defective or dangerous machinery, appliances, or places for work
- d. Methods of work, rules, and orders
- e. Failure to warn or instruct servant

- i. Connection between negligence charged and injury sustained
- j. Liability imposed by statute, and violation of statutory duty
- k. Willful or wanton injury

a. Duty Owed to Servant

The declaration or complaint in an action for injuries must show the existence of a particular legal duty owed by the master to the servant.

In an action by a servant to recover for personal injuries, the declaration or complaint must show the existence of a particular legal duty owed by the master to the servant,⁵³ and a mere allegation of duty without stating the facts on which it rests is insufficient.⁵⁴ The duty violated may be expressly pleaded⁵⁵ or may be implied from the facts directly averred,⁵⁶ but it cannot be implied from a mere allegation that an act or omission was negligent.⁵⁷ Where facts are alleged from which the law implies a duty on the part of the master, the complaint need not allege why such duty arises.⁵⁸

Degree of care required. It has been held that a demurrer will lie to a declaration or complaint which charges a higher degree of care than the law imposes.⁵⁹ On the other hand, it has been held that, where the law will imply a legal duty from the facts stated, the statement of too high a duty is mere surplusage which will not render the pleading demurrable.⁶⁰

b. Acts Constituting Negligence or Breach of Duty in General

The declaration, petition, or complaint must contain, in an action by a servant for personal injury, an express averment of negligence or breach of duty by defendant, or such fact must appear by legal intendment from the facts alleged.

The general rules governing the sufficiency of the declaration, petition, or complaint in actions for injuries caused by negligence are applicable in an action by a servant for personal injuries sustained through the negligence of the master.⁶¹ The declaration, petition, or complaint must contain an express averment of negligence or breach of duty on the part of defendant, or such fact must appear by legal intendment from the facts alleged.⁶² However, while it is not sufficient to charge negligence in general terms as a conclusion of law, and while it must be shown in what the negligence complained of consisted,⁶³ the particular acts or omissions which constitute and go to prove the negligence need not be averred, it being generally sufficient merely to state such facts as will make it appear to the court what the act of negligence alleged to have caused the injury was,⁶⁴ and it is only when the acts and things alleged are such that they cannot constitute negligence under any possible state of facts or circumstances which could be proved under the averments in the declaration or complaint that the court will, after verdict and judgment, say, as a matter of law, that negligence was not sufficiently pleaded.⁶⁵ Specifications of negligence may be pleaded sufficient to meet any probable condition which might have caused the injury.⁶⁶

c. Defective or Dangerous Machinery, Appliances, or Places for Work

- (1) In general
- (2) Knowledge of master
- (3) Ownership, possession, or control of instrumentalities or places

(1) In General

In an action for injury resulting from defective or dangerous machinery, appliances, or places for work, the declaration, petition, or complaint must allege with a reasonable degree of particularity facts showing the existence and nature of the defect and the master's negligence with respect thereto.

A servant suing for injury resulting from defective or dangerous machinery, appliances, or places for work, must allege with a reasonable degree of loading of a car, it need not state the manner in which it should have been loaded in the exercise of reasonable care.⁷⁰ It has been held, however, that a petition which fails to allege the existence of a safety device capable of preventing the injury is demurrable.⁷¹ A complaint alleging failure to furnish a safe place for work need not charge that the master contracted to do so.⁷² Plaintiff is not required to negative every fact which would tend to establish defendant's freedom from negligence.⁷³

Employment of minor. The declaration or complaint in an action by an immature employee having little or no experience in the work is not defective because it appears from the allegations that the injury resulted from a simple tool.⁷⁴ However, where the action is based on the employment of a minor in a dangerous occupation without the consent of the parent, a petition which fails to allege that the employment was without the parent's consent or against her will or that the minor was put at a dangerous employment without the parent's consent, or that defendant knew of the servant's minority, is insufficient.⁷⁵

(2) Knowledge of Master

Generally, the declaration or complaint must allege that the master knew, or ought to have known, of the alleged defect or danger, and that such actual or constructive knowledge existed a sufficient length of time to permit a removal in the use of reasonable care.

In an action by a servant against his master to recover for injuries caused by defective or dangerous appliances or places, it must, as a general rule, be alleged that the master knew, or ought to have known, of the alleged defect or danger,⁷⁶ although some authorities have held that this allegation is unnecessary, since want of knowledge is a matter of defense.⁷⁷ However, a direct averment of actual or constructive knowledge is unnecessary, where it is necessarily implied from the facts alleged,⁷⁸ as where it is alleged that the defect was in the construction of the appliance or place, or existed when the appliance was furnished,⁷⁹ or where the defect resulted from the master's failure to comply with a duty imposed by statute;⁸⁰ and a general allegation of knowledge by defendant of the defect is sufficient to include constructive as well as actual knowledge.⁸¹ Where the complaint is based on the master's negligence in failing to inspect and to use ordinary care to make the place of work reasonably safe, it need not allege that the master knew that plaintiff was ignorant either of the defects or of the failure to inspect.⁸²

Time of acquiring knowledge. It has been held that defendant's actual or constructive knowledge of a defect should be alleged to have existed a sufficient length of time to permit a removal in the use of reasonable care,⁸³ and that a complaint charging merely that plaintiff was injured by a defect arising from defendant's negligence is insufficient, where it does not allege the time defendant actually learned of the defect.⁸⁴ On the other hand, it has been held that the exact time when knowledge of the defect was acquired need not be alleged where the complaint charges that defendant had long known of the defect,⁸⁵ or had knowledge thereof when he ordered plaintiff to work at the place of injury,⁸⁶ or that the defect had existed for a stated time before the accident, and was known or should have been known by defendant.⁸⁷

It need not be alleged that the master had a reasonable time in which to remove the defect after he had received notice thereof.⁸⁸ Where, however, the complaint alleges a defect which arose by use and wear, and does not show that the master had knowledge of the defect before the appliance was placed in plaintiff's charge, it is insufficient, although there is a general averment of knowledge, unless it also shows that defendant had such knowledge a sufficient length of time to have enabled him to repair the defect.⁸⁹ An averment that a defect had not been discovered or remedied owing to defendant's negligence imports that it had existed long enough to have been discovered and remedied had defendant used due care.⁹⁰

(3) Ownership, Possession, or Control of Instrumentalities or Places

Ordinarily the declaration or complaint must allege that the instrumentality or place, whose defective or dangerous condition occasioned the injury, was owned or controlled by the master.

The declaration or complaint in an action by a servant against the master for personal injuries must allege that the instrumentality or place, whose defective or dangerous condition occasioned the injury, was owned or controlled by the master,⁹¹ or that he jointly owned or controlled it.⁹² However, where the injury occurred in a building owned by a third person, in which defendant was installing machinery, it is sufficient to allege that defendant was plaintiff's master in the performance of the work, without stating what relation the master sustained to the building.⁹³

Where a servant's right of recovery for injury is based on negligent methods of work, rules, or orders, or on negligent failure to adopt and enforce proper rules, the declaration or complaint must allege facts from which a legal inference of negligence may be drawn.

Where the declaration or complaint bases a right of recovery on negligent methods of work, rules, or orders, or on negligent failure to adopt and enforce proper rules, it must allege facts from which a legal inference of negligence may be drawn.⁹⁴ So, it has been held that it must be alleged that the master knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, that plaintiff was in a position of danger,⁹⁵ and that injury would result,⁹⁶ except where the master is chargeable with such knowledge.⁹⁷ Where it is alleged that the servant was directed by some officer or agent of defendant to pursue a certain method of work which resulted in the injury, the pleading should show the authority of such officer or agent.⁹⁸ Plaintiff must allege the giving of a direct and specific order,⁹⁹ that such order was acted on under compulsion or in an emergency,¹ and that the person giving the command knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care, could have known,

Where the negligence charged is the violation of rules, it is not necessary to allege the master's knowledge of the existence of such rules.³ The rules violated need not be set out verbatim,⁴ although their substance should be alleged.⁵ However, if the acts of negligence relied on, and which are alleged to be in violation of rules, are specifically set out, it is not necessary to set out either the rules or their substance.⁶ Exceptions contained in a rule prescribed by defendant need not be negated in the declaration.⁷

Where violation of a custom is alleged, the complaint should show what such custom was,⁸ and

Customary methods

Common use of Fresno scraper raises presumption of reasonable safety and imposes on person claiming that it is unsafe or unsuitable to a particular use to allege that the general use does not extend to particular use in question, together

should allege plaintiff's knowledge thereof,⁹ and his reliance thereon.¹⁰ It has been held not necessary, however, to allege the master's knowledge of the custom.¹¹ It has been held proper to allege a general custom among others in the same business,¹² but, where the complaint does not rely on a violation of custom, it need not allege the custom or practice of others than the employer in relation to the acts of negligence complained of.¹³

Where failure to promulgate rules is charged as negligence, the complaint must allege facts showing the master's duty to plaintiff.¹⁴ Plaintiff, however, need not specify what the rules should be,¹⁵ although the contrary has been held where the particular rule which should have been adopted does not otherwise appear from the allegations in the pleading.¹⁶

Where a servant seeks to recover for injury on the theory that they were caused by the master's failure to warn or instruct him, the declaration or complaint must allege facts which show a negligent failure to perform such duty.

Where a servant seeks to recover for injuries on the theory that they were caused by the master's failure to warn or instruct him, the declaration or complaint must allege facts showing the danger,¹⁷ the duty to warn or instruct,¹⁸ a negligent failure to perform that duty,¹⁹ and, as discussed infra subdivision i of this section, a causal connection between such failure and the injury complained of.

It is not sufficient to allege defendant's duty to warn as a conclusion of law,²⁰ and a mere allegation of defendant's duty to warn is insufficient without a statement of facts showing the existence of such duty.²¹ However, if the facts alleged show a duty to warn and that the injury resulted from failure to perform such duty, a specific averment of the existence of the duty and the negligent failure to discharge it is unnecessary.²² So, if the facts alleged show that the servant, owing to his youth and inexperience, was not capable of following instructions and that the master had knowledge of this fact, a cause of action is stated, although the petition does not allege a failure to warn or instruct.²³ Plaintiff need not allege the particular warning required, or the particular damage to be apprehended, in the absence of special demurrer for uncertainty.²⁴

Master's knowledge of danger. In order to show a breach of duty to warn or instruct, the declaration or complaint must allege, or state facts showing, that the master had actual or constructive knowledge of the danger.²⁵ However, a general averment of negligence in failing to warn has been held sufficient in this respect.²⁶

Servant's lack of knowledge or experience. It must be alleged that the servant was ignorant of the danger or was inexperienced and in need of warning or instruction.²⁷ However, it has been with the factual reasons therefor. or that, if it does, then the facts must be so fully disclosed in detail that it may be said therefrom that the means or method is so extrahazardous that impartial persons could not well be in disagreement on it.—Newell Contracting Co v Flynt, 161 So 288, 172 Miss 719, motion overruled 161 So 743, 172 Miss 719. held that an allegation that defendant wrongfully and negligently failed to warn or instruct implies that the servant was without the necessary knowledge or experience, without a direct averment of that fact.²⁸

Master's knowledge of servant's lack of knowledge or experience. The declaration or complaint must allege, or state facts showing, that the master knew or should have known that the servant was inexperienced or ignorant of the danger.²⁹ However, where the complaint alleges the master's knowledge of the danger and the servant's ignorance thereof, a general averment of negligence in failing to warn sufficiently alleges that the master knew or should have known that the servant should be warned.³⁰

f. Negligence in Employment or Retention of Servants

In an action based on the negligence of the master in selecting or retaining in his service an incompetent servant, the incompetency of the fellow servant, and the negligence in employing or retaining him with knowledge, actual or constructive, of such incompetency, should be alleged.

In an action against a master for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, based on the theory of the negligence of the master in selecting or retaining in his service an incompetent servant, the declaration or complaint should show the existence of the relation of master and servant at the time of the injury,³¹ that the fellow servant was incompetent, that the master negligently employed or retained him with knowledge, actual or constructive, of his incompetency,³² and, in some jurisdictions,³³ but not in others,³⁴ that plaintiff was ignorant of such incompetency. It must also be alleged or shown that the injury was caused by the incompetency of the servant charged with negligence, as discussed infra subdivision 1 of this section.

The servant's ignorance of the fellow servant's incompetency,³⁵ as well as the master's knowledge thereof,³⁶ may be inferred from the facts alleged; and an allegation that the act of employing a servant was done in a negligent manner, and that in consequence thereof an incompetent servant was taken into defendant's service, has been held a sufficient specification of negligence in employing an incompetent servant, without alleging that defendant knew, or could have known, of his incompetency.³⁷ A general allegation of knowledge is sufficient to include either actual or constructive knowledge.³⁸

The particulars of the servant's incompetency need not be set out;³⁹ nor need the exact time when the master acquired knowledge of the incompetency be alleged.⁴⁰ An averment of "negligence and carelessness" is not equivalent to an allegation that the servant was incompetent.⁴¹

g. Negligence in Employment of Insufficient Force

In an action based on the negligence of the master in failing to employ a sufficient number of men for the work, a general allegation of negligence in failing to provide a sufficient force, in consequence of which plaintiff was injured, is sufficient.

Where the theory of the action is that the master was negligent in failing to employ a sufficient number of men for the work, a general allegation that the master negligently failed to provide a sufficient force, in consequence of which the injury complained of was sustained, is sufficient.⁴² The master's negligence must be distinctly alleged,⁴³ but the declaration or complaint need not specify how many servants should have been engaged in the work,⁴⁴ or how the assistance of additional help would have prevented the injury,⁴⁵ nor need it set out in detail other facts on which the servant relies as showing how the injury occurred,⁴⁶ at least in the absence of a motion for a more definite statement.⁴⁷

h. Acts or Omissions through Agents or Representatives

Acts or omissions of a master through agents or representatives may be charged as negligence of the master, or, under some circumstances, as negligence of the servant, or they may be charged as negligence of the master acting by or through his servants, or as the negligence of both master and servant.

In an action by a servant to recover for personal injuries, an allegation that the negligence relied on was that of defendant is good, as against a demurrer, although in point of fact the negligence was that of a servant for whom defendant, as master, was responsible.⁴⁸ The negligence may, however, be charged as that of the servant where the servant acts in a supervisory capacity,⁴⁹ or where the facts alleged show that it consists of a breach of a nonassignable duty,⁵⁰ or it may be charged as the negligence of the master acting by or through his servants or agents,⁵¹ or as the negligence of both master and a servant performing an act for which the master is liable.⁵²

It is not sufficient to show a state of facts which merely suggests that a coservant may have owed a duty which he neglected,⁵³ but a complaint defective in this respect may be cured by the answer.⁵⁴ The averments of the pleading must show that the servant inflicting the injury was an employee of defendant,⁵⁵ and that the act of the negligent servant was within the scope of his employment,⁵⁶ or that, at the time such act was committed, he was under the control of the master.⁵⁷ However, it is not necessary for plaintiff to set out the contract between the negligent servant and the master, or state his conclusion as to the scope of such servant's employment.⁵⁸

It must be alleged that the act of negligence charged was the proximate cause of the injury sustained, or facts must be stated from which such causal connection may be legally implied.

In consequence of the rule that the master's liability for injury to a servant depends on whether or not his negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, as discussed supra § 187, the declaration or complaint must allege that the act of negligence or the breach of duty charged was the proximate cause of the injury sustained, or state facts from which such causal connection may be legally implied.⁵⁹ Thus, where an act constituting a violation of a statute is relied on, it must be alleged that it was the proximate cause of the injury.⁶⁰ A general allegation is sufficient,⁶¹ unless the specific allegations are so inconsistent therewith as to show that the general averment is not true.⁶²

(1) In General

Where the liability sought to be enforced is imposed by statute, or the negligence alleged to have caused the injury consists of a breach of statutory duty, facts must be alleged which clearly bring the case within the statute.

Where the liability sought to be enforced is imposed by statute, or the negligence alleged to have caused the injury consists of a breach of statutory duty, the declaration or complaint in an action by a servant to recover for personal injuries must allege facts which clearly bring the case within the statute,⁶³ and, in addition to this, must allege in terms that the act constituting a violation of the statute was the proximate cause of the injury or must state facts from which such causal connection can be legally implied, as discussed supra subdivision i of this section. While it is not sufficient to charge a violation of the statute in general terms as a conclusion of law, and it must be shown in what the violation complained of consisted,⁶⁴ technical accuracy is not required⁶⁵ and the precise language of the statute or ordinance need not be followed.⁶⁶ Plaintiff need not plead in detail facts which are peculiarly within the knowledge of defendant.⁶⁷ Resort cannot be had to inferences in order to supply omissions of material facts,⁶⁸ but the averment

Where the statute imposes a mandatory duty, negligence⁷⁰ or actual or constructive notice of the dangerous condition⁷¹ need not be charged. As a general rule it is sufficient to allege that the injury resulted from a breach of the statutory duty⁷² without alleging in what manner the failure to comply with the statute caused the injury,⁷³ or that plaintiff had no knowledge of the defect or danger, as discussed infra §§ 492, 493, or, where the negligence consists in the failure to guard a machine, that the machine was dangerous.⁷⁴

Exceptions in the statute are matters of defense and need not be negatived,⁷⁵ especially where they do not apply to the particular duty for the breach of which the action is brought⁷⁶ or are contained in a separate clause⁷⁷

In actions under federal statutes by a servant to recover for personal injuries, the declaration, petition, or complaint must allege facts which clearly bring the case within the statute.

In actions under various federal statutes by a servant to recover for personal injuries, the declaration, petition, or complaint must allege facts which clearly bring the case within the statute⁸² or must set out facts from which a violation of the statute may be inferred.⁸³ Where the allegations are otherwise sufficient, however, it is not necessary to plead the statute or expressly to invoke its terms.⁸⁴ An allegation that defendant was engaged

In an action for injuries where the Federal Employers' Liability Act and the Safety Appliance Act and the State Hazardous Occupation Act are relied on, declaration should contain allegations to put defendant on notice of such fact, since defenses and proof under the different acts will be materially different—Atlantic Coast Line R Co v Moore, 181 So 374, 135 Fla 485, modified on other grounds 186 So 210, 135 Fla 485

defendant was engaged, and plaintiff was employed, in interstate commerce has been held not fatal,⁹⁰ as where the court will take judicial notice of such facts⁹¹ or where the evidence requires a finding that the employee was engaged in interstate commerce.⁹²

The complaint must also allege the existence of some duty on the part of defendant toward plaintiff,⁹³ defendant's negligence or breach of duty,⁹⁴ injury to plaintiff,⁹⁵ and that the act of negligence charged was, in whole or in part, the proximate cause of the injury sustained, as discussed supra subdivision i of this section.

If the allegations are otherwise sufficient, the statute need not be specifically declared on or referred to.⁹⁶ It has been held that, even where the complaint does not state facts sufficient to make the statute applicable, it will be treated as applicable if the evidence shows the necessary facts.⁹⁷ Where the pleading alleges facts which establish the right to recovery under the federal statute, it has been held immaterial that plaintiff alleges that his right to recover is determinable under a state statute.⁹⁸ The sufficiency of the pleading is not affected by an allegation that the master's common-law liability was in force at the time and place of the injury.⁹⁹

k. Willful or Wanton Injury

In an action for willful or wanton injury plaintiff must allege that the act complained of was willfully done with intent willfully to inflict the particular injury.

A declaration or complaint by a servant against the master for willful or wanton injury must allege that the act complained of was willfully done with intent willfully to inflict the particular injury.¹

§ 491. — Negligence of Fellow Servants

- a. In general
- b. Under statutes modifying fellow-servant rule

a. In General

Where the pleading in a common-law action for injury to a servant charges negligence on the part of the master, it need not affirmatively aver that the injury was not caused by the negligence of a fellow servant; but, where it appears that the act or omission causing the injury was that of a fellow servant, plaintiff must allege, or state facts showing that he and such servant were not fellow servants.

Where the declaration, petition, or complaint in a common-law action for injury to a servant charges negligence on the part of the master, it need not affirmatively aver that the injury was not caused by the negligence of a fellow servant;² and, where a servant alleges injuries caused by the negligence of the master and sets forth the acts of omission constituting the negligence, the fact that the petition shows that the negligence of a fellow servant contributed to the injury does not render it demurrable.³ So, where the negligence is charged directly against the master, although a corporation incapable of acting otherwise than through agents, it will not be assumed on demurrer that the act or omission was, in its nature, that of a fellow servant.⁴

Where, on the other hand, the negligence is charged as that of a servant, or it appears affirmatively on the face of the pleading that the act or omission causing the injury was that of a fellow servant,⁵ or where, under the facts stated, the injury might have resulted from the negligence of a fellow servant,⁶ plaintiff must allege, or state facts showing, that he and such servant were not fellow servants, or, as discussed supra § 490 f, that defendant was negligent in employing such servant or retained him after he knew, or ought to have known, that he was incompetent. In some jurisdictions it has been held insufficient to allege as a legal conclusion that the negligent servant was a vice principal of defendant.⁷ Where an action is brought for injury occurring in another state, if, by the common law of the state, plaintiff and those whose negligence caused the injury were not fellow servants, plaintiff must plead such law as a fact.⁸

The name of the negligent servant need not be stated⁹ if the pleading alleges what duties the servant performed¹⁰ or otherwise shows that he was acting as vice principal in respect of plaintiff.¹¹

b. Under Statutes Modifying Fellow-Servant Rule

Where the fellow-servant rule has been modified or abrogated, the declaration or complaint must allege facts which show negligence on the part of the servant causing the injury.

Matter not raised by demurrer

A demurrer to a declaration in an action for injuries to an employee, which states that the declaration as a whole does not allege facts constituting a legal cause of action, does not raise the question whether a co-employee, whose acts were complained of as negligent, was a fellow servant of the employee—Johnson v. 11. Tex.—Suderman v. Krizan, 109 S.W. 373, 50 Tex.Civ.App. 29. 39 C.J. p 940 note 98.

Where the fellow-servant rule has been modified or abrogated,¹² as by an employers' liability act,¹³ the declaration or complaint must allege facts which show negligence on the part of the servant causing the injury and otherwise bring the case clearly within the terms of the statute. If the facts alleged are sufficient for this purpose the precise words of the statute need not be used,¹⁴ and the particular acts or omissions which constitute and go to prove the negligence need not be averred¹⁵ in the absence of a demand for a bill of particulars or a motion to make the complaint more definite and certain.¹⁶ Also, if the facts alleged bring the case within the statute, the complaint need not allege that defendant is liable under its provisions.¹⁷

An allegation that the negligent servant had knowledge of the danger has been held unnecessary;¹⁸ but there is also authority to the contrary.¹⁹ The pleading must show to which servant or servants negligence is imputed,²⁰ although where the negligence is charged as that of one exercising superintendence it is sufficient without alleging the nature of the superintendence;²¹ and the fact that the fellow servant was acting within the scope of his employment must be averred or be necessarily implied from the facts alleged.²² The complaint cannot be made to piece out a common-law action with the aid of such provisions of a state employers' liability act as constitute under the common law negligence of a fellow servant.²³

Name of negligent servant. Under some statutes a complaint for injury to a servant caused by the negligence of a coemployee intrusted with superintendence, or to whose order plaintiff was bound to conform, must state the name of the negligent coemployee or allege that his name is unknown to plaintiff;²⁴ but, where the action is brought under that section of the statute making the master liable for injuries caused by defects in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant, the name of the servant intrusted with the duty of seeing that such ways, etc., were in proper condition need not be stated.²⁵ In at least one jurisdiction it is not necessary to state the name of the employee intrusted with superintendence.²⁶

In some jurisdictions where assumption of risk is regarded as an affirmative defense, plaintiff ordinarily need not negative such defense, in other jurisdictions it is generally necessary for the declaration, petition, or complaint to negative assumption of risk.

In an action to enforce the master's common-law liability, assumption of risk by the injured servant is regarded in some jurisdictions as an affirmative defense, the burden of proving and establishing which is on defendant, as discussed infra § 501, and plaintiff need not negative such defense by alleging his want of knowledge of the defect or danger²⁷ unless the case made by his own pleading raises an inference of knowledge²⁸ This rule, however, has been held not to apply where the injury occurred in the execution of an express command by the master, and in such case want of knowledge must be averred²⁹ unless it is charged that the servant was coerced to undertake a dangerous work which he did not possess the capacity or experience to perform with safety.³⁰ In other jurisdictions it is necessary, as a rule, for the declaration, petition, or complaint to negative assumption of risk³¹ unless the risk was an extraordinary one³² or the danger instantaneous.³³

Irrespective of what rule prevails as to the necessity of negating assumption of risk, a declaration or complaint is demurrable where it affirmatively shows that the risk was assumed³⁴ On the other hand, where it does not clearly appear from the declaration or complaint, or by inference from the facts alleged, that the servant assumed the risk, the pleading may be sufficient³⁵

Alleging want of knowledge of defect or danger. Where assumption of risk is required to be negated, the declaration or complaint should allege that the servant had no knowledge of the defect or danger,³⁶ or, if he had knowledge, it should state an excuse for continuing work³⁷ An allegation that plaintiff was without fault has been held not to take the place of an averment of want of knowledge,³⁸ although there is also authority to the contrary.³⁹ While it has been held that express allegations are not required,⁴⁰ allegations of want of knowledge by the servant must be direct and not by way of recital,⁴¹ and should be as broad as those averring knowledge by the master.⁴² However, a general allegation of want of knowledge, where plaintiff relies on his ignorance of the defect or danger to show nonassumption of risk, has been held sufficient⁴³ unless overcome by the facts specifically stated,⁴⁴ and such an allegation negatives both actual and constructive knowledge.⁴⁵ On the other hand, it has been held that an allegation that plaintiff did not know of the defect or danger is not sufficient to negative constructive knowledge.⁴⁶

Statutory liability. The declaration or complaint need not negative assumption of risk where the action is based on neglect of a duty imposed by statute⁴⁷ or is brought under a statute which excludes such defense in the particular case.⁴⁸

b. Notice or Complaint, and Promise of Remedy

Where the servant had knowledge of the condition which caused his injuries, but bases his action on the master's promise to remedy such condition, he should allege notice or complaint to the master, the promise of remedy, reliance on the promise, and lapse of a reasonable time for repairing after the promise was made.

Where the servant had knowledge of the defect or danger which caused his injuries, but bases his right of recovery on a promise by the master to remedy the defect or remove the danger, he should allege notice or complaint to the master, the promise of remedy, his reliance on the promise, and the lapse of a reasonable time for repairing after the promise was made,⁴⁹ although a complaint failing to allege reliance on the promise or that a reasonable time for repair had elapsed has been held sufficient after verdict.⁵⁰ It has also been held that plaintiff should allege that he believed he would be discharged if he did not continue the dangerous work.⁵¹

On the other hand, it has been held that, where plaintiff is not required to negative assumption of risk, a fortiori he is not bound to show why he did not assume the risk; and if defendant sets up assumption of risk as a defense plaintiff may prove a promise to repair, although he did not plead such promise.⁵² If the complaint shows that an unreasonable time had elapsed between the promise and the injury, the servant will be held to have waived the promise and assumed the risk,⁵³ although this, being a matter of defense, need not be negated.⁵⁴

Violation of statute Where the action is based on the violation of a statutory duty, plaintiff need not plead such statute in order to avail himself of its provisions relieving him from the assumption of risk in continuing in the service after knowledge of the danger.⁵⁵

c. Inexperienced or Youthful Servants

Assumption of risk is sufficiently negated where it is alleged that the servant was inexperienced or youthful, that he did not know or appreciate the dangers to which he was exposed, and that the master, knowing these facts, failed to warn or instruct him as to the dangers of his employment.

Assumption of risk is sufficiently negatived where it is alleged that the servant was inexperienced or youthful, that he did not know or appreciate the dangers to which he was exposed, and that the master, knowing these facts, failed to warn or instruct him as to the dangers of his employment.⁵⁶ These facts, however, must be definitely pleaded.⁵⁷

§ 493. — Negating Contributory Negligence

In some jurisdictions, but not in others, the declaration or petition must contain allegations negating negligence on the part of plaintiff, but under either view if the facts alleged show contributory negligence the declaration or complaint is bad.

In some jurisdictions contributory negligence is regarded as an affirmative defense, which must be alleged and proved by defendant in a common law action by a servant for injury, and consequently need not be negatived by plaintiff⁵⁸ unless the declaration or complaint raises an inference of contributory negligence.⁵⁹ In other jurisdictions it is held that the absence of contributory negligence is essential to the servant's cause of action, and that therefore the declaration or complaint must contain allegations negating negligence on the part of plaintiff,⁶⁰ in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary.⁶¹

Under either view if the facts alleged show contributory negligence the declaration or complaint is bad,⁶² even though there is a specific allegation that plaintiff was in the exercise of due care or that he had no knowledge of the defect or danger.⁶³ However, although the pleading states facts from which it might be inferred that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, yet, when such an inference does not necessarily follow from the averments of the declaration, petition, or complaint, taken as a whole, an allegation directly negating such negligence renders it good as against a general demurrer.⁶⁴

Where it is necessary to negative contributory negligence, a general allegation of due care on the servant's part, or his freedom from contributory negligence,⁶⁵ as by the use of the phrase "without fault" on his part,⁶⁶ is generally sufficient unless overcome by the other facts alleged. Where several grounds of negligence are alleged, plaintiff must plead facts showing that he was free from fault as to each ground.⁶⁷

Alleging want of knowledge of defect or danger. While the question of negating the servant's want of knowledge of the defect or danger is generally considered as relating to the doctrine of assumption of risk, discussed supra § 492, it has been treated in some cases as equally applicable to the doctrine of contributory negligence; and, where it is necessary to negative the latter defense, the declaration or complaint must show want of knowledge on the part of the servant,⁶⁸ although in some jurisdictions an allegation of want of knowledge has been held to be unnecessary where it is averred that the servant was in the exercise of due care.⁶⁹ Where knowledge of the defect or danger is required to be negated, a general allegation of want of knowledge is sufficient unless the specific facts stated contradict it,⁷⁰ and such allegation will cover both actual and constructive knowledge.⁷¹ On the other hand, it has been held that freedom from implied knowledge can be alleged in the form of a legal conclusion only when the facts set forth show such a state of circumstances as relieves plaintiff of such an imputation; otherwise the court will disregard the legal conclusion and give judgment on the facts actually stated.⁷²

An allegation that plaintiff had no opportunity to examine the appliance causing the injury is not equivalent to an allegation that he did not know that it was defective.⁷³ Even in those jurisdictions where contributory negligence is required to be negated, an allegation of want of knowledge has been held unnecessary where the servant was under no duty to examine the place alleged to be defective⁷⁴ or had a right to rely on the master's judgment as to the kind of tool to be used,⁷⁵ or where the complaint shows that he was ordered to work outside the scope of his employment or away from the place of his usual work.⁷⁶ Where contributory negligence need not be negated, it has been held that, where knowledge by the person injured of his own physical condition is immaterial to a statement of his cause of action, plaintiff need not allege want of such knowledge.⁷⁷

Alleging youth and inexperience of servant. Contributory negligence may be negated by averring that, owing to the servant's youth and inexperience, he did not appreciate the danger and was not warned thereof.⁷⁸ Where it is not necessary to negative contributory negligence, plaintiff need not allege that he was inexperienced and did not appreciate the character of the work or the danger involved.⁷⁹

Statutory liability. Plaintiff need not negative contributory negligence where his action is based on neglect of a duty imposed by statute⁸⁰ or is brought under a statute abolishing that defense in the particular case.⁸¹ On the other hand, it has been held, in an action under a statute providing that injury to a railroad employee by reason of a defective car shall be prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company, that the statute does not affect the rule requiring the petition to negative knowledge of the defect on the part of the employee.⁸²

The allegations of the plea or answer must be definite and certain and responsive to the allegations of the declaration or complaint. Generally affirmative defenses must be specially pleaded.

The general rules of pleading govern as to the form and sufficiency of the plea or answer in an action by a servant to recover from his master for personal injuries⁸³ The allegations of the plea or answer must be definite and certain⁸⁴ and responsive to the allegations of the declaration or complaint⁸⁵ Affirmative defenses are not generally available to defendant unless they are specially pleaded⁸⁶ However, in an action based on a statute defendant is not required specially to plead an exception contained in the statute,⁸⁷ nor is it necessary for defendant to plead facts showing that the injury to the servant arose from a cause different from that alleged by plaintiff⁸⁸ Matters avoiding a defense pleaded should be set up by replication, and need not be negatived in the plea⁸⁹

Inconsistent defenses; duplicity Pleas of assumed risk and contributory negligence are not destroyed because coupled with a denial of negligence.⁹⁰ On the other hand, it has been held that a claim of contributory negligence implies some negligence by defendant and is inconsistent with a general and qualified denial of negligence⁹¹ A plea setting up both assumption of risk and contributory negligence has been held bad for duplicity.⁹²

Admissions A plea or answer may by its form, nature, or substance operate as an admission of some facts alleged in the declaration, complaint, or petition⁹³ An allegation that the accident was caused by the negligence of the employee, or by the negligence of a fellow servant "in the service" of the employer "with" plaintiff, is an admission of the employment⁹⁴ On the other hand, an answer does not admit the dangerous condition of an appliance where it alleges that plaintiff "could well have known of its location and construction, and the dangers thereto, if any such dangers existed"⁹⁵ A plea which admits the killing of the servant, but does not admit that he was free from fault or that the other employees were at fault, is not a plea of justification⁹⁶

Plea held not to constitute admission

Pleading Workmen's Compensation Act. Where the master claims that the action is within the Workmen's Compensation Act, and not cognizable in the courts, he must plead his compliance with the act.⁹⁷ However, he need not negative exceptions in the act.⁹⁸

Negligence of fellow servants. The defense that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant must be set up, in some jurisdictions, by plea or answer in order to be available,⁹⁹ unless such negligence affirmatively appears from plaintiff's own pleadings or proofs,¹ but it is not necessary to specify the fellow servant whose negligence caused the injury or state in what the negligence consisted.² In other jurisdictions, however, defendant may show that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant without pleading the fact specially.³ Where plaintiff alleges negligence of the master in selecting an incompetent fellow servant whose negligent act caused the injury, defendant's denial both of the incompetency and the negligent act does not estop him to set up the defense of nonliability for the negligence of the fellow servant, if the evidence involves such negligence and either fails to establish the alleged incompetency or leaves the matter in issue.⁴

b. Assumption of Risk

Ordinarily assumption of risk by an employee is an affirmative defense which must be specially pleaded, but it has been held that the defendant need not plead a contractual assumption of risk, and, where it appears from the plaintiff's pleadings or proof that the risk was assumed, the defendant may avail himself of the defense without pleading it.

It has been generally held that assumption of risk by an employee is an affirmative defense which must be specially pleaded,⁵ since in its nature it is a plea in confession and avoidance.⁶ This is usually the rule where the risk is an extraordinary one created or enhanced by the master's negligence, and which the servant voluntarily assumes by continuing in the employment with actual or constructive knowledge of the defect and danger.⁷

It has been held, on the other hand, that defendant need not plead a contractual assumption of risk, that is, a risk ordinarily and necessarily incident to the employment,⁸ since, as discussed infra § 499, such defense is available under a plea of the general issue or under a general denial; and an allegation setting up assumption of a risk incident to the employment is mere surplusage, presenting no affirmative defense.⁹ In some jurisdictions, however, the assumption of an ordinary risk must be pleaded by defendant.¹⁰ In a jurisdiction which follows the rule that the servant does not assume the risk of injury from the master's negligence, but that contributory negligence of the servant may constitute a defense, discussed supra § 362, it has been held that assumption of risk is not a proper plea to an action founded on the master's negligence,¹¹ although where the plea of assumption of risk is tantamount to the defense of contributory negligence it must be affirmatively pleaded.¹²

In any event, where it appears from plaintiff's own pleadings or proof that the risk was assumed, defendant may avail himself of the defense without pleading it.¹³ Also, where the complaint alleges that the servant did not assume the risk, a denial of the allegation is sufficient to raise the issue.¹⁴

statement showing that the specific risk was assumed,¹⁵ and ordinarily the pleading must also show that the risk was normally incident to, and to be expected of, the employment, and was not merely created by the employer's negligence.¹⁶ If the averment is of an extraordinary risk of the employment, defendant must allege, or state facts showing, that the servant had knowledge of the defect, or that it was obvious, and that he knew or should have known of the attendant danger.¹⁷

Where the answer sets out facts constituting assumed risk, it is not necessary to designate the defense in specific terms as that of assumed risk.¹⁸ In those jurisdictions where it is necessary for defendant to plead assumption of the risk of the master's negligence, a plea of assumption of a risk incident to the employment is insufficient.¹⁹

c. Contributory Negligence

Generally the defense of contributory negligence is not available unless specially pleaded, and the plea must state the facts constituting the negligence.

Although it has been held that contributory negligence need not be specially pleaded,²⁰ the general rule is that such defense is not available unless pleaded.²¹ However, the general rule does not apply where plaintiff's own case discloses contributory negligence or necessarily puts in issue all the facts relied on by defendant to show it;²² and, where the declaration or complaint alleges that plaintiff was without fault, a denial by defendant raises the issue of contributory negligence.²³ Where a complaint is not based on negligence of the master, but on the employment of a minor at dangerous work without the consent of the parent, a plea of contributory negligence is inapt.²⁴

Right to plead contributory negligence

An employer can plead contributory negligence as a defense whether or not the action is governed by em-

Where contributory negligence operates merely to diminish damages, as discussed in the CJS title Negligence §§ 170-172, also 39 C.J. p 822 note 79-p 824 note 19, and 45 C.J. p 1037 note 97-p 1043 note 62, a plea setting up contributory negligence in bar of the cause of action is demurrable.²⁵ The necessity of pleading contributory negligence as a pro tanto defense to an action brought under the Federal Employer's Liability Act generally depends on the laws of the state in which the action is instituted.²⁶ In some jurisdictions the defense of contributory negligence need not be specially pleaded in mitigation of damages,²⁷ and evidence of contributory negligence may be shown in reduction of damages under the general issue, as discussed infra § 499. In other jurisdictions, sometimes by virtue of express statutory requirement, contributory negligence as a partial defense in mitigation of damages must be specifically set up in the answer in order to be available.²⁸

Sufficiency of plea. The general rules of pleading, particularly those applicable to negligence cases, govern as to the sufficiency of the plea or answer to raise the issue of contributory negligence in an action by an employee for personal injuries.²⁹ A plea of contributory negligence is in its nature a plea of confession and avoidance,³⁰ and it is the general rule that the facts constituting such negligence must be stated,³¹ although it has been held that an allegation of contributory negligence in general terms is sufficient,³² at least after verdict and judgment³³ or in the absence of a motion to make more specific.³⁴ However, it is not necessary that the allegations of the plea should be as specific as the proof in order to support it³⁵ or that matters of evidence should be stated.³⁶

Allegations of contributory negligence should not be in the alternative,³⁷ and, if they are, the sufficiency of the pleading must be tested by its weakest averment.³⁸ Where plaintiff's nonperformance of a duty imposed by statute is relied on as constituting contributory negligence, the answer should show that he was within the class of persons contemplated by the statute.³⁹ In an action under the Employers' Liability Act, if contributory negligence must be pleaded, a plea following the language of the statute is sufficient.⁴⁰

Proximate cause of injury. It has been held that the contributory negligence charged must be pleaded as the proximate cause of the injury,⁴¹ although a direct allegation is not necessary if the plea, when considered with the complaint, shows the causal connection.⁴²

Designation of plea immaterial A plea setting up the facts constituting contributory negligence is good, although it is designated as a plea of assumed risk.⁴³

§ 495. Replication or Reply

Matters in avoidance of a defense of assumed risk or contributory negligence must sometimes be pleaded by way of replication or reply.

The general rules of pleading, particularly those applicable to negligence cases, govern as to the necessity⁴⁴ and sufficiency⁴⁵ of a replication or reply in an action by a servant for personal injuries. Where the servant seeks to avoid the defense of assumed risk by the master's promise to remedy conditions, he must specially plead such promise,⁴⁶ and the replication is insufficient if it fails to allege that a reasonable time for making the repairs had not expired at the time of the injury.⁴⁷

A replication asserting that the servant continued in the employment after a knowledge of the danger, on the master's promise to remedy the defect, is inappropriate to a plea of contributory negligence.⁴⁸ If defendant alleges the servant's violation of a rule, special matter excusing or justifying such violation must be set up by replication.⁴⁹ Where defendant pleads contributory negligence in an action based on a statute which provides that such negligence, when slight, shall not bar the action, but shall reduce plaintiff's damages, a special replication alleging the slight character of plaintiff's negligence is not necessary.⁵⁰

A general denial has been held in some jurisdictions a good reply to averments in an answer setting up contributory negligence and assumption of risk.⁵¹

§ 496. Amendment of Pleadings

- a In general
- b To conform to proof

a. In General

The allowance or refusal of amendments of pleadings rests largely in the discretion of the trial court.

As in civil actions generally, the allowance or refusal of amendments of pleadings in an action by a servant for injury caused by the master's negligence rests largely in the discretion of the trial court.⁵² However, an amendment should not be allowed which sets up a new cause of action⁵³ or renders

b. To Conform to Proof

Ordinarily it is within the discretion of the trial court to permit an amendment to conform to the proof where evidence has been introduced without objection as to facts not presented, or insufficiently presented, by the pleadings.

In accordance with the general rules of pleading, the court may permit an amendment to conform to the proof where evidence has been introduced without objection as to facts not presented, or insufficiently presented, by the pleadings⁵⁹ The discretion of the court to permit the amendment should be exercised liberally⁶⁰ and in such a manner as to avoid prejudice or injury to the adverse party⁶¹

Employment by one of several defendants

In employee's action for injuries, where in pretrial report defendants conceded that plaintiff was employed by one of defendants and plaintiff claimed that he was employed by both defendants, it was not necessary that plaintiff prove liability of both defendants, since, where two or more are liable for the same cause of action, they are liable severally as well as jointly, and, if one is sued alone, entire damage may be recovered against him—Eckstein v Scoff, 13 NE 2d 436, 299 Mass 578 fact not alleged by plaintiff is required where the defective declaration is cured by verdict.⁷⁵ Where general allegations of negligence are followed by an averment of the specific act of negligence alleged to have caused the injury, there can be no recovery, as a general rule, unless the specific act is proved,⁷⁶ but, where defendant is charged with negligence in several particulars, plaintiff need not prove every branch of the case but may recover on proof of a cause of action on any one or more of such acts of negligence,⁷⁷ even though the several acts of negligence are alleged conjunctively or as concurring to produce the injury.⁷⁸ On the other hand, it has been held that, where several defects or acts are averred conjunctively, or pleaded as interdependent or concurring causes of the injury, all must be proved.⁷⁹ Where an action against a corporation employer is in case, and not in trespass, plaintiff need not show that defendant's president or board of directors actually participated in the alleged negligent act.⁸⁰

Facts admitted by the adverse party need not be proved;⁸¹ but a plea of the general issue does not admit the relationship of master and servant so as to dispense with proof thereof.⁸²

Under Federal Employers' Liability Act

Allegation that plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce when injured distinguishes cause of action from one at common law and may preclude defendant from asserting certain defenses thereto otherwise available under common or statutory law of state governing plaintiff's cause of action, such as defense of contributory negligence.—Davis v.

other hand, any evidence otherwise admissible may be received if the matters to which it relates are expressly or by clear inference substantially embraced within the scope of the allegations of the party offering it⁸⁵ or tend to explain the circumstances surrounding the accident⁸⁶ It has been held that

Interstate commerce

In a switchman's action for injuries, where there was nothing in declaration to indicate that plaintiff relied on the Federal Safety Appliance Act or the Federal Employers' Liability Act, evidence with reference to interstate commerce was irrelevant and should have been excluded—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Moore, 181 So. 374, 135 Fla. 485, modified on other grounds 186 So. 210, 135 Fla. 485.

Conflicting pleadings

In action against railroad for death of employee, exclusion of testimony to effect that employee was warned against act which proved fatal was not error where railroad's pleadings were conflicting as to whether employee was performing duties assigned to him at time of his death—Snow v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., La. App. 166 So. 200.

Negligence of fellow servant

(1) In servant's action for personal injuries, declaration alleging substantially no more than that foreman negligently performed act causing injury was not sufficient to perform predicate for proof showing that in performing such act the foreman had joined with fellow servants in manual work and that master had not exercised reasonable care in establishing and maintaining reasonably safe method of work.—Federal Compress Co. v. Craig, 7 So. 2d 532, 192 Miss. 689.

(2) Defendant employer could not invoke doctrine of negligence of fellow-servant as defense where it did not in its pleading urge that defense nor request a submission of that issue to jury—City of Wichita Falls v. Phillips, Tex. Civ. App., 87 SW 2d 544, error dismissed.

(3) Where negligence charged was failure of employer to furnish reasonably safe tools, objection to question as to whether saw guide was in suitable condition to be used in operation of a sawmill in view of worn condition of threads on ground that condition of threads was not shown to be cause of plaintiff's injury should have been overruled—Carlisle v. Tilghmon, Mo., 174 S. W. 2d 798.

(5) Where petition of railroad employee for injuries sustained when assaulted while serving as night watchman guarding railroad bridge used in interstate commerce did not contain allegation that there was any defect in any appliance or any violation of a safety act, the doctrine of assumption of risk was applicable as a defense—Devore v. Louisiana & Arkansas Ry. Co., La. App., 178 So. 706.

(1) In actions to which Federal Employers' Liability Act is applicable, it has been held not necessary to plead that parties were engaged in interstate commerce in order to introduce proof to that effect—Pisano v. Texas & N. O. R. Co., Tex. Civ. App., 112 S. W. 2d 316, error dismissed.

(2) In action against railroad company for injuries to employee parties' stipulation that defendant was engaged in interstate commerce and evidence that plaintiff was engaged in performance of duties incident thereto when injured were sufficient to bring action within provisions of Federal Employers' Liability Act, though not referred to in pleadings—Davis v. Evidence of condition of passageway, although not alleged, was admissible in explanation of the cause of piece of freight falling from truck and pinning plaintiff against box car, or for the purpose of accounting for breaking of truck, although it was not admissible as a basis for evidence of the employer's promise to repair is admissible even though not alleged in the declaration, where proof of such promise is not a substantive part of plaintiff's case, but is in the nature of rebuttal to the defense of assumption of risk claimed by the master.⁸⁷

General or specific allegations of negligence. Ordinarily, under a general allegation of negligence, evidence may be introduced of any acts or omissions which tend to show actionable negligence on the part of defendant, as charged in the complaint.⁸⁸ So defendant's knowledge, being an ingredient of negligence, may be proved under a general allegation of negligence,⁸⁹ and under such a general allegation evidence of willful or gross negligence is admissible.⁹⁰ It has been stated, however, that a general allegation of negligence is limited in scope and confines the issues to a definite field without specifying a definite act,⁹¹ and plaintiff is not permitted to prove any particular act or acts of negligence which he may see fit to show.⁹² The proof must be of negligence within the general scope of the allegations of the complaint.⁹³ Thus it has been held that evidence of negligence by failure to furnish a safe place or safe instrumentalities is not competent under a general charge of negligence.⁹⁴

Where specific acts of negligence⁹⁵ or particular defects in the machinery, appliances, or place for work furnished by the master⁹⁶ are alleged, plaintiff's proof must also be specific and evidence of other defects or negligent acts ordinarily is inadmissible. It has also been held that evidence of acts of negligence not alleged is admissible solely for the purpose of determining whether the specific negligence charged has been established, and will not in itself warrant recovery.⁹⁷ In some jurisdictions it has been held that, where general allegations of negligence are followed by an enumeration of specific acts, plaintiff will not be limited to proof of such acts unless the complaint fairly indicates his intention so to limit it.⁹⁸

Rules and customs. Evidence as to rules of the master and customs as to the mode of performing the work is admissible, although not specially pleaded, if the matters sought to be shown thereby are within the issues raised by the pleadings.⁹⁹ So evidence of a custom or usage is admissible, although not specially pleaded, where such custom or usage is merely incidental and is relied on only as evidence of some other fact in issue¹ or where it is not relied on to take the case out of a general rule of law.² However, evidence of a custom or usage is inadmissible unless specially pleaded where the custom or usage is a substantive matter and is not merely evidentiary of other facts in issue,³ or is relied on to take the case out of a general rule of law.⁴

Ordinances. As a general rule plaintiff cannot claim the benefit of a municipal ordinance imposing a duty on defendant unless he pleads it.⁵ However it has been held that, where an ordinance is offered merely to show the negligence alleged, and the action is not based on its violation, it may be received in evidence, although not pleaded.⁶

Effect of elimination of count. The admission of evidence authorized under a count of the complaint is not rendered erroneous because such count is subsequently eliminated from the case.⁷

Waiver of objections Where defendant goes to trial on a pleading charging general negligence in failing to furnish a safe place in which to work, after receiving a bill of particulars showing where in the place was not safe, it cannot prevent plaintiff from proving the facts showing such unsafety by objecting to the proof as not being within the issues.⁸

b. Under General Issue or General Denial

Under the general issue or general denial only defenses which are not required to be specially pleaded are available.

Under the general issue or general denial any defense is available which is not required to be specially pleaded.⁹ Under such a pleading defendant may show anything which tends to prove that the cause of action never existed,¹⁰ such as that the act of plaintiff was the sole proximate cause of the injury,¹¹ or that the injury was caused by the negligence of a third person for whom the master was not responsible,¹² or that the injury was the result of an unavoidable accident.¹³ So too defendant may show that plaintiff was not his employee,¹⁴ or, where the negligence of a fellow servant is a defense, that the servant's injury was caused by such negligence,¹⁵ or, where the negligence of a fellow servant is not a defense, that such negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury,¹⁶ or that the alleged fellow servant was not acting on behalf of the employer and did not commit the tortious act in the course of the employment.¹⁷ Also it has been held that the defenses of assumption of risk¹⁸ and contributory negligence¹⁹ are

- Under Federal Employers' Liability Act
- Contributory negligence, in action under Federal Employers' Liability Act, is provable under general issue.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Parker, 138 So. 231, 223 Ala. 626, certiorari granted 52 S.Ct. 496, 286 U.S. 535, 76 L.Ed. 1275, certiorari dismissed 53 S.Ct. 94, 287 U.S. 569, 77 L.Ed. 501—39 C.J. p. 955 note 22.

Under the rule that matters of affirmative defense must be specially pleaded, discussed supra § 494, an affirmative defense cannot be shown under a general denial or plea of the general issue.²⁰ Thus in those jurisdictions where such defenses must be specially pleaded, assumption of risk,²¹ and contributory negligence,²² and negligence of a fellow servant,²³ are not provable under a plea of the general issue or a general denial.

c. Under Allegations as to Incompetency of Fellow Servants

In order to warrant the admission of evidence that a fellow servant through whose negligence plaintiff was injured was incompetent, the declaration or complaint must allege his incompetency.

In order to warrant the admission of evidence that a fellow servant through whose negligence plaintiff was injured was incompetent, the declaration or complaint must allege his incompetency²⁴ and aver that the master knew or should have known of such incompetency.²⁵ On the other hand, it has been held that, in an action for injuries resulting from the negligence or incompetency of a vice principal, it need not be alleged that such person was vice principal, or that his incompetency was known to defendant, to admit proof that the injury was caused by his negligence or incompetency.²⁶

An allegation of gross negligence involves the competency of the fellow servant and renders admissible evidence as to his experience.²⁷ Generally any facts are admissible in evidence, under an allegation of incompetency or lack of skill, if they tend to establish or disprove the allegation;²⁸ otherwise they are not.²⁹

d. Under Allegations as to Contributory Negligence

On an issue of contributory negligence defendant may introduce evidence of any facts tending to establish his defense and plaintiff may avail himself of any facts which tend to disprove such negligence.

On an issue of contributory negligence defendant may introduce evidence of any facts tending to establish his defense.³⁰ However, a plea of contributory negligence is not sufficient to let in the defense that the injury was caused by the negligence of fellow servants,³¹ nor will an allegation of contributory negligence in general terms admit of the defense of disobedience of orders;³² and, where defendant alleges a specific act of contributory negligence, he cannot rely on any other act of negligence.³³ Since a plea of contributory negligence filed with a general denial admits that there is an issue of negligence between the parties, defendant cannot show that plaintiff was employed by a third person who is the proper party to be sued.³⁴

On an issue of contributory negligence, plaintiff may avail himself of any facts which tend to disprove such negligence,³⁵ even though not alleged

Under Federal Employers' Liability Act

When an action is brought in the state court under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the procedure should conform as nearly as may be to that of the state law, therefore, in order to establish contributory negligence under the federal statute, it should be considered and treated as a partial defense, coming within the terms of the local law and must be pleaded to make it available—Fleming v Norfolk Southern R Co., 76 SE 212, 160 NC 196.

in his declaration or complaint³⁶ On the other hand, it has been held that the mental weakness of an adult servant is not admissible to negative contributory negligence unless it is pleaded³⁷ It has also been held that contributory negligence cannot be disproved by evidence that the servant carefully discharged his duties, since the issue is whether he used due care under the circumstances existing at the time of the injury, and not as to his habits³⁸

Rules and customs. Defendant may introduce its rules for the purpose of showing contributory negligence without alleging that plaintiff had violated a rule,³⁹ but there is also authority to the contrary⁴⁰

Effect of elimination of issue of negligence Where an employee charged the excessive speed of a train as negligence, and also alleged, in anticipation of the defense of contributory negligence which defendant subsequently pleaded, that because of such speed he was unable to avoid injury, evidence as to the speed of the train was admissible on the issue of contributory negligence, although the issue of negligence based on excessive speed had become immaterial.⁴¹

§ 500. — Variance

In an action by a servant against his master for personal injuries the plaintiff can recover only on the case made by the declaration or complaint and a material variance between the allegations and the proof is fatal.

In an action by a servant against his master for personal injuries plaintiff can recover only on the case made by the declaration or complaint,⁴² and a material variance between the allegations and proof is fatal⁴³ There is a material variance under this rule where specific acts of negligence are alleged and negligent acts not alleged are proved.⁴⁴ Where the proof substantially supports the pleading, the fact that it varies therefrom on some immaterial matter is not a fatal variance.⁴⁵ In some jurisdictions it has been held, sometimes under express statutory provision, that no variance will be deemed material unless it actually surprises or misleads the opposite party to his prejudice⁴⁶ and that no judgment will be reversed for anything which might have been amended below.⁴⁷

Proof of part of matters alleged Where the proofs sustain a portion of the allegations of the pleading, there is no variance if such portion amounts to a cause of action⁴⁸ Thus, where such defects or acts of negligence are pleaded and established by proof as will render defendant liable, it is not a material variance that other defects or negligent acts were alleged but not proved,⁴⁹ if such allegations could not have misled defendant⁵⁰

Excess of proof. Recovery cannot be defeated by proof of negligent acts not relied on, where the negligence relied on and proved was the proximate cause of the injury.⁵¹

leged and ordinary negligence proved does not constitute a variance⁵²

Actions at common law or under state or federal employers' liability acts The fact that allegations of a violation of an act of congress, such as the Federal Employer's Liability Act, are not sustained by the proof will not prevent recovery under allegations in the same petition which state a cause of action at common law and are proved,⁵³ nor will failure to sustain a cause of action under the federal law prevent recovery under a state employers' liability act, where both causes of action are pleaded and the cause based on the state act is supported by proof⁵⁴ So, where a cause is pleaded under the Federal Employers' Liability Act and the proof shows that plaintiff was not engaged in interstate commerce, but establishes a case under the state law, there is no material variance if the complaint is broad enough to cover both statutes;⁵⁵ and where the allegations of the complaint are broad enough to cover both a cause of action at common law and a cause of action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, and the proof sustains a case under the federal act, there is no material variance.⁵⁶

It has been held, on the other hand, that where a cause is pleaded solely under the Federal Employers' Liability Act and the proof establishes that plaintiff was not engaged in interstate commerce, but establishes a case under the common law, there is a material variance.⁵⁷ Also a material variance arises where only a common-law right of action is alleged and the proof discloses a liability created by an employers' liability act, state or federal,⁵⁸ and this is also true where the action is brought under the state act and the evidence shows that the case is controlled by the federal act⁵⁹ or by the workmen's compensation act,⁶⁰ but it has been held that the fact that the pleadings state a case under the common law and make no mention of the federal law does not preclude a recovery based on application of the Federal Employer's Liability Act.⁶¹

Where the evidence shows that a case brought under the state law is in fact controlled by the federal statute, defendant may interpose the objection that no recovery can be had on the case proved, although he did not plead the federal act,⁶² and where an action against a common carrier is brought under the common law defendant may, in defense, rely on the federal statute, without pleading it, if he can show or the testimony of plaintiff shows that defendant was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the injury.⁶³ On the other hand, it has been held that defendant cannot show affirmatively as a defense, without pleading it, that an action brought under the state law is in fact governed by the federal act.⁶⁴

(1) In General

Certain presumptions are available to the parties in an action against a master to recover for injuries to a servant, but a presumption will not be indulged in unless the facts necessary to support it are present.

In actions against masters to recover for injuries to servants, various presumptions may be available to the parties.⁶⁵ Of course, a presumption will not

Presumptions held available

(1) Where there is no allegation to the contrary in action against employer, presumption is that ten-year-old male employee was normal.—Stucker v. American Stores Corporation, 171 A. 230, 5 WW Harr., Del., 594

(2) Presumption is that experienced switchman knew how work was ordinarily performed, and that he was competent to perform it—Wheelock v. Freiwald, CCA Mo., 66 F.2d 694

(3) Vice-principal of master while discharging duties relating solely to ordinary functions of a servant will be presumed to have assumed status of a servant, and master will not be liable for vice-principal's acts of negligence resulting in injury to another servant—Haynie v Foremost Dairies, 187 SE 907, 54 Ga.App 369.

(4) As respects duty to warn, employee is presumed to see and understand all dangers that prudent and intelligent person of same age and experience and with same capacity for estimating their significance would understand—Ward v. Maine Cent R Co., 166 A. 826, 132 Me. 88

(5) Car inspector, struck by train, must be assumed, in absence of evidence to contrary, to have possessed normal hearing and sight—Kansas City Southern Ry. Co. v Jones, Tex Civ App., 282 SW. 309, affirmed 287 SW 304, reversed on other grounds Jones v Kansas City Southern Ry Co., Com App., 291 SW 528, reversed on other grounds 48 S.Ct. 308, 276 U. Employer's knowledge of risks

(1) What an employer ought reasonably to know is dangerous to his employees it is his duty to know, and therefore he is presumed to know it—Martin v. Atlantic Transport Co., 85 A. 29, 237 Pa. 15

(2) An employer is conclusively presumed to know dangers and risks to which he subjects employees—

be indulged in or a fact assumed unless the facts necessary to support such a presumption or assumption are present,⁶⁶ and a presumption cannot be built on another presumption.⁶⁷ The fact that one is found doing service for another may raise a presumption that the relation of master and servant exists between them,⁶⁸ and not that of contractor and contractee,⁶⁹ although there is authority to the contrary,⁷⁰ and, where plaintiff proves that he was employed by defendant even at a considerable time prior to the accident, it will be presumed that the contractual relation existed at the time of the injury.⁷¹ Where a railroad servant is injured while riding on defendant railroad company's pass in going back and forth from his work, it may be presumed that he was employed as a servant at the time.⁷² In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act it is said there is no presumption that the relation of master and servant existed at the time the alleged injury was received.⁷³

As to injury in performance of master's work

which he was working is presumed to have been in the performance of his duties.⁷⁴ The same presumption obtains where the cause of a fatal accident is unknown and deceased servant was at his designated place of employment at the time.⁷⁵ However, there is no presumption that a servant is in the line of his duty after it is shown that he has left his place of work,⁷⁶ and the presumption that a servant was doing his duty when injured creates no implication that the master was negligent.⁷⁷

As to employment in interstate or intra-state commerce Ordinarily, in the absence of proof to the contrary, it will be presumed that the employer, while in the use and operation of its railway within a state, was engaged in intra-state commerce,⁷⁸ at least where plaintiff does not allege that he was injured while engaged in interstate commerce,⁷⁹ but no such presumption arises where there is proof to the contrary.⁸⁰ The mere fact that a man is employed by a railroad raises no presumption that he was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the injury;⁸¹ neither does the fact that one of the cars involved in the collision resulting in the injuries contained "perishables" raise a presumption that it was used in interstate commerce.⁸² As a general rule railroad employees such as members of switching or yard or station crews, whose duties may involve both interstate and intra-state commerce, are not so exclusively identified with either type of activity that they may be presumed to be engaged in the one rather than in the other.⁸³ Subject to the usual rules governing presumptions in civil actions generally, various other presumptions may be available in actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act on the question of whether defendant and the injured employee were at the time and place of the injury engaged in interstate or intra-state commerce.⁸⁴

As to existence of remedy in foreign jurisdiction. It has been held that, where plaintiff brings suit to recover for injuries received in another jurisdiction, it will be presumed that there is a law in force in such jurisdiction furnishing a remedy for the injury.⁸⁵ However, although there is authority to the contrary,⁸⁶ it has also been held that the fellow-servant rule will be presumed to obtain in such ju-

As to what law controls. It has been held that, in the absence of proof that a servant is engaged in interstate commerce, the presumption obtains that the law of the forum controls the rights of the parties to the litigation.⁸⁸

(2) As to Negligence or Fault of Master Generally

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, there is ordinarily no presumption that the master was negligent, but there is rather a presumption that the master exercised due care.

In an action by a servant against his master for personal injuries there is a prima facie presumption that the master was free from negligence;⁸⁹ at least there is no presumption that he was negligent.⁹⁰ As affecting the question of the master's negligence, there is a presumption that the physician employed by him for an injured servant is reasonably skillful and competent.⁹¹ In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act there is a presumption that defendant performed its duty⁹² and exercised due care,⁹³ which offsets and counteracts the presumption of due care on the part of plain-

Presumption not available

Presumption did not obtain, from fact that local freight train left point within state with interstate load, that its consist was in whole or in part interstate at time railroad brakeman was injured at another point so as to authorize brakeman to maintain action under Federal Employers' Liability Act, since the consist of a train is not continuous in its nature—Russell v St Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co, 81 SW2d 631, 336 Mo 845.

tiff⁹⁴ There is no available statutory or common-law presumption of negligence of defendant.⁹⁵

(3) As to Cause of Injury

(a) In general

(b) Existence of defect or happening of event

(c) Res ipsa loquitur

(a) In General

The evidence may be such as to raise a presumption as to the cause or manner of the injury.

In an action against a master to recover for injuries to a servant as a result of negligence, the evidence may be such as to raise a presumption as to the cause or manner of the injury.⁹⁶ However, the circumstances relied on to prove defendant's negligence will not ordinarily be presumed;⁹⁷ and there can be no presumption that the injury was caused in one way when there is positive and undisputed evidence that it was caused in another way.⁹⁸ There is no presumption that the master's neglect to instruct plaintiff as to the hazards of the employment was the cause of the injury suffered by plaintiff.⁹⁹

(b) Existence of Defect or Happening of Event

No presumption of negligence on the part of the master ordinarily arises from the mere existence of a defect or from the occurrence of the accident through which the servant was injured; and this rule obtains in actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, or circumstances making applicable the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, as discussed infra subdivision a (3) (c) of this section, the general rule is that no presumption of negligence on the part of the master arises from the mere existence of a defect or the happening of the accident through which the servant was injured,¹ and, where the evidence leaves the cause of an injury unproved, it cannot be attributed to defendant's negligence.² This has been held true even where a highly dangerous agency, such as electricity, is employed by the master and the servant is injured thereby,³ even though the accident is of an unusual character,⁴ or even though the injury was directly caused by reason of a failure of a machine or appliance furnished by the employer.⁵ The rule, however, has been held inapplicable where the peculiar characteristics of the injury may be linked in the chain of circumstances tending to prove negligence.⁶ Where it is shown that the servant was injured while the master was acting in violation of a statute, the injuries will be attributed to negligence, in the absence of anything to show the contrary.⁷

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act the fact of an accident whereby plaintiff was injured carries no presumption of defendant's negligence sufficient to warrant recovery,⁸ at least where plaintiff's injury was not due to defendant's violation of the Federal Safety Appliance Act.⁹

(c) Res Ipsa Loquitur

Although there is authority to the contrary, it is quite generally held, both in ordinary actions by a servant against the master for injuries and in actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable in a proper case.

The question of the applicability of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in an action against a master to recover for injuries to a servant has given rise to considerable discussion and conflict and a certain amount of confusion among the decisions.¹⁰ Some authorities expressly and categorically deny the applicability of the doctrine in master and servant cases,¹¹ while others hold that it should be applied only rarely and in certain isolated cases,¹² and even then only with great caution.¹³ However, the majority of the decisions are in agreement that the doctrine is applicable in a proper case in an action

by a servant for injuries,¹⁴ especially where a statute has abolished the fellow-servant rule,¹⁵ although it has been pointed out that the application of the doctrine in such cases is somewhat restricted by the subsidiary rules governing the relationship between the parties¹⁶

Even where the doctrine is applicable the usual limitations obtain, that is to say, the presumption

or inference of negligence is, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, deducible not from the mere happening of the event, but from the attendant circumstances¹⁷ Thus, the doctrine is applied or the inference is drawn where and only where the thing or condition causing the injury is under the exclusive¹⁸ control and management¹⁹ of the master, and where in ordinary experience the accident does not

In federal courts

(1) It has been held that the doctrine is inapplicable in cases between master and servant—Phillips Petroleum Co v. Manning, CCA Ark, 81 F 2d 849—39 CJ p 975 note 98 [a]

(2) In a number of cases, however, the doctrine has been applied—F W Martin & Co v. Cobb, CCA Ark, 110 F 2d 169—Lowery v Hocking Valley Ry Co, CCA Ohio, 60 F 2d 78—Altman v Atlantic Coast Line R. Co, CCA Fla, 18 F 2d 405—Cochran v Pittsburgh & L E R Co, D C Ohio, 31 F 2d 769—39 CJ p 975 note 98 [a]

(3) Also, in a number of cases it has been held that, where an employee is injured by an instrumentality under the control and management of the employer, and there is evidence negating fault on the part of the employee, and such an accident does not ordinarily happen if due care is exercised, such circumstances constitute evidence or permit an inference of negligence on the part of the employer—American Glycerin Co v Brown, CCA Tex, 30 F 2d 316—39 CJ p 977 note 10

In Kentucky

(1) It has been held that, while it is the rule that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies to a case of master and servant, it does not apply with the same fullness and weight as in cases where the relation of master and servant does not exist—West Kentucky Coal Co v Key, 198 SW 724, 178 Ky 220—Hartung v Ten Broeck Tyre Co, 190 SW 677, 173 Ky. 155—Baltimore & O. R Co v Smith, 184 SW. 1108, 169 Ky 593, L R A 1918F 1205

(2) Also, it has been said that the doctrine is applied as between master and servant only in extreme cases—Louisville & N R Co v Grant, 2 SW 2d 1063, 223 Ky 39

(3) However, it has also been said that, as a general rule, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply where relationship of master and servant exists—Magness' Adm'x v. Hutchinson, 117 SW 2d 1041, 274 Ky 226—Fee's Adm'x v. Mahan-Ellison Coal Corporation, 43 SW 2d 681, 241 Ky 231.

Operation or use by employee

(1) It has been held that the fact that injured employee was operating or working with the instrumentality usually happen without negligence on the master's part²⁰ It is often difficult to determine what inference can reasonably be drawn from the facts;²¹ and the propriety of applying the doctrine in a particular case must be determined in the light of the special facts of the case and the teachings of experience with regard to them,²² for common experience is the basis of presumptions of fact.²³ At all events, the doctrine will not be applied if the evidence does not show that the accident was of such a character as to justify the inference or presumption of negligence on the part of defendant²⁴ causing the injury does not of itself necessarily forbid the application of the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur"—Whitaker v Pitcairn, 174 S.W.2d 163, 351 Mo. 848

(2) However, it has also been held that the res ipsa loquitur rule was not applicable in action by gas employee against employer and superintendent for injuries sustained when gas heater in basement of dormitory maintained by company for benefit of employees exploded when employee attempted to light heater, since employee, and not company, was making "use" of heater, and since explosion did not occur without any voluntary action on part of employee within the rule—Stanolind Oil & Gas Co v Bunce, 62 P.2d 1297, 51 Wyo. 1.

Likewise, where the accident may have happened as a result of one of two or more causes, and it is not more reasonably probable that it was due to the negligence of the master than to any other cause, the doctrine is inapplicable²⁵

The prima facie case of negligence arising from application of the doctrine is rebuttable,²⁶ and although, in order to make the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applicable in the first instance, plaintiff need only show facts raising a reasonable inference of negligence without excluding every other reasonable hypothesis of negligence,²⁷ nevertheless, where evidence is adduced to explain the happening of the occurrence on any other theory than that of the negligence claimed, the jury should disregard the inference arising from the fact of the injury²⁸ It is sometimes said that the inference of negligence is allowed from necessity when the causes of an injury cannot be clearly shown by the injured party and ought to be known to the employer,²⁹ and that the inference is not otherwise drawn,³⁰ and, although there is authority to the contrary,³¹ it has been held that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur may be invoked only where there is a general allegation of negligence unaccompanied by specific allegations.³²

So it is held that the doctrine is inapplicable where the servant knows or has an opportunity of knowing the defect which caused the accident,³³ or where direct evidence explaining the accident is introduced³⁴ or is available to plaintiff³⁵ The doctrine does not dispense with the rule that the party who alleges negligence must prove it;³⁶ on the contrary, it only determines the method of proving it, or what shall be prima facie evidence of negligence in a certain class of cases.³⁷

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act negligence of defendant is not to be inferred from the mere fact that plaintiff was injured, as discussed supra subdivision a (3) (b) of this section, and the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has been held inapplicable,³⁸ or at least not usually applicable,³⁹ and under this rule a state statute creating a presumption of negligence of defendant on proof of an injury occurring in the operation or running of trains cannot be applied.⁴⁰ However, it has been pointed out that many of the cases frequently relied on to support the contention that the doctrine is inapplicable in such actions do not so hold, but hold only that the mere fact of an accident raises no presumption of negligence,⁴¹ and there is considerable authority for the view that the doctrine is aperal rule, res ipsa loquitur cannot be invoked where plaintiff pleads⁴⁷ and proves⁴⁸ specific acts of negligence proximately causing the injury.

Whether or not the doctrine is applicable so as to raise a presumption of negligence, it is agreed that an inference of negligence may be drawn from the circumstances attending an accident,⁴⁹ as, for example, where an injury is caused by a defect in an instrumentality exclusively in the control of defendant⁵⁰ and where the accident is one that does not usually occur without negligence of the master⁵¹. On the other hand, such an inference is not drawn where the facts surrounding the accident do not create even a reasonable probability that it was the result of defendant's negligence,⁵² or where the facts were not so unusual and of such a nature that the injury could not well have been incurred without defendant's negligence,⁵³ or where the injury was not caused by something connected with the equipment or operation of the road over which defendant had entire control⁵⁴.

An inference or presumption of negligence merely requires defendant to produce evidence in explanation or rebuttal, and the inference or presumption is to be weighed against defendant's evidence, observing the rule that the burden of proof is upon plaintiff, and, if the probative force of the circumstances and facts in evidence do not preponderate in favor of the presumption and against defendant's proofs, plaintiff fails to make out his case⁵⁵.

(4) As to Equipment or Place of Work

Although the facts in a given case may raise a contrary presumption, there is ordinarily a rebuttable presumption that the master used due care with respect to the equipment and place of work provided for its servants.

The law presumes, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the master has performed his duty with reference to furnishing his servants with reasonably safe and suitable tools, machinery, appliances, and places for work,⁵⁶ and had no notice of

Doctrine held not abandoned

In action under act for damages sustained by head brakeman in derailment of train, brakeman by offering evidence as to amount of rainfall and negligent failure of railroad to inspect track, and by stating in his brief that railroad's evidence showed gross negligence supporting brakeman's prima facie case under res ipsa loquitur doctrine, did not abandon reliance on res ipsa loquitur doctrine, so as to bind himself to submit case on theory of specific negligence, where true cause of accident was in doubt—Whitaker v Pitcairn, 174 S.W.2d 163, 351 Mo 848

Reliance on rule to prove specific acts

In action by switchman against railroad for personal injuries, plaintiff having made specific allegations of negligence must rely for his recovery on the specific acts or causes alleged and cannot recover for any other, but fact that plaintiff made specific allegations of negligence does not deprive him of the benefit of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur

any defects therein,⁵⁷ and even a statutory provision has been held not necessarily to destroy the presumption;⁵⁸ but, where the defect through which the injury occurred is in the original construction of the appliance or instrumentality, knowledge of the defect by the master will be presumed.⁵⁹ However, the facts in a given case may raise a presumption of the master's negligence with respect to equipment furnished,⁶⁰ and a railroad company is conclusively presumed to have knowledge of the unsafe condition of its tracks over which its trains run.⁶¹ The presumption in favor of the master is rebuttable,⁶² but it will not be presumed that a railroad company inspected a particular car for defects by which an employee was injured, on a showing that it was the custom to inspect all cars,⁶³ and it has been held that there is no presumption in the master's favor but simply an absence of presumption against him.⁶⁴ A statute providing that proof of an injury caused by a defect in certain tools or appliances raises a presumption of knowledge and constitutes prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the master is not applicable where the injury was not caused by such a defect.⁶⁵

In action under Federal Employers' Liability Act the presumption prevails that the master was not aware of the existence of a defect in machinery, appliances, or equipment, even after proof of such defect.⁶⁶ Where plaintiff's injuries are alleged to have been caused by defendant's violation of the Ash Pan Act, it will be presumed that the ash pan placed on the locomotive complied with the requirements of the statute.⁶⁷ There is no presumption that the place where plaintiff was injured was unsafe as the result of a negligent failure of defendant,⁶⁸ neither does a presumption arise from the mere occurrence of the accident that the tools furnished by the employer were insufficient;⁶⁹ and, although it has been held that the circumstances may create an inference that the master violated a statutory duty with respect to machinery or appliances,⁷⁰ it has also been held that a violation of the Federal Boiler Inspection Act cannot be inferred from the mere fact that injury resulted from some condition of the locomotive, without evidence of an existing defect which could have caused the accident.⁷¹

(5) As to Methods of Work, Rules, and Orders

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it may be presumed that the methods of work and rules prescribed by a master were proper and sufficient and were enforced, that the injured employee had knowledge of an existing rule, and that he did not disobey orders.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary,⁷² it will be presumed that the methods of work adopted by a master, and the rules and regulations promulgated by him for the government of his employees, were proper and sufficient⁷³ and were enforced,⁷⁴ and, where the existence of a rule or custom is shown, it will be further presumed that it was known to an employee at the time of his injury,⁷⁵ and the master will be presumed to have knowledge of a custom existing for a long time regarding his work,⁷⁶ There is a presumption also that a servant did not disobey orders,⁷⁷ and that he complied with defendant's rules.⁷⁸

Where a switch was thrown, causing a collision of trains, it will be presumed that the switch was thrown in pursuance of orders from some one in authority who was superior to the engineer and whose orders those in charge of the train were bound to obey.⁷⁹ A servant's failure to obey positive orders as to the manner of doing his work is prima facie evidence of his negligence.⁸⁰ Where an employee is ordered to do certain work, it may be presumed that the employer has superior knowledge of the perils attending the performance thereof,⁸¹ and in case of doubt such presumption must prevail in behalf of the employee.⁸²

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the presumption obtains that defendant's rules were known by its servants.⁸³ Where a custom to give warning to employees under certain circumstances is proved, the injured servant is presumed to have known of it⁸⁴ and to have relied on it.⁸⁵ Where injury to an employee occurs by reason of another employee's violation of a rule adopted to protect employees, there is a strong, and in some cases decisive, presumption of negligence.⁸⁶ Of course, an assumption that a particular rule was in force will not be indulged in where there is substantial evidence to the contrary.⁸⁷

(6) As to Competency, Selection, and Retention of Servants

Coemployees of the injured employee are ordinarily presumed competent; and the master is presumed to have exercised due care in the selection and retention of his servants, although he will also be presumed to have known what was generally known regarding the incompetency of one of them.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, employees of defendant other than the one injured are presumed competent.⁸⁸ While a master is presumed to have known in regard to the incompetency of a fellow servant what was generally known to those among whom such servant worked and lived, and what he might have known by the exercise of due care and diligence,⁸⁹ he will be presumed, in the absence of affirmative proof to the contrary, to have exercised proper care in the selection and retention of his servants⁹⁰ The presumption may be rebutted,⁹¹ as by evidence of the servant's general reputation for unfitness without proof that such reputation was known to the master's representatives.⁹²

(7) As to Assumption of Risk

It is generally held that a servant is ordinarily presumed to have known and assumed the ordinary risks and obvious dangers of his employment, but the rule does not apply to a servant whose youth or lack of experience or mental capacity is such as to repel the presumption.

As a general rule a servant will be presumed to know the risks ordinarily incident to his employment,⁹³ as well as defects and dangers so obvious

as to charge him with knowledge thereof,⁹⁴ and he will be presumed to have assumed the ordinary risks of his employment,⁹⁵ at least where it may be inferred from the allegations in plaintiff's complaint that he was of full age and possessed of all his faculties,⁹⁶ and also to have assumed the risks arising from defects and dangers of which he has, or ought to have, knowledge⁹⁷ In some jurisdictions, however, knowledge of defects and dangers being a matter of defense, no presumption of knowledge arises, in the absence of evidence that the servant did have knowledge,⁹⁸ nor is he presumed to have assumed the risk of special dangers, arising from a peculiar condition of affairs,⁹⁹ or the risk of the master's own negligence¹ occurring after the servant enters the employment.²

If a servant is a minor,³ or is by reason of lack of experience or mental capacity unable to comprehend the dangers incident to the employment,⁴ or is known to the master to be immature and inexperienced so as to be unfit to perform the duty assigned to him,⁵ he will not ordinarily be presumed to have assumed the ordinary risks of his employment, although under some circumstances even a minor may be presumed to have assumed such risks.⁶ Where a servant continues to work because of a promise by the employer to repair a defect, there is no presumption that he assumes the risk incidental to the defect,⁷ unless the time for the performance of the promise has gone by, and he knows that the repairs have not been made.⁸

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, it has been held that a servant will not be presumed to have assumed a risk which was not conspicuous,⁹ but he is conclusively¹⁰ presumed¹¹ to have known and assumed such risks as are ordinarily incidental to his employment, provided they are not due to the master's negligence or violation of law.¹²

(8) As to Contributory Negligence

In some jurisdictions, and in actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the injured servant will be presumed to have been free from fault; and as a general rule plaintiff will be given the benefit of the presumption arising from the instinct of self-preservation.

In some jurisdictions the injured servant will be presumed to have been free from fault,¹³ where there is an absence of direct testimony on the subject,¹⁴ and, as discussed infra subdivision b (11) of this section, the burden of proof to the contrary rests on defendant. In these jurisdictions, as well as in jurisdictions where no such presumption prevails, the rebuttable presumption arising from the instinct of self-preservation is indulged in,¹⁵ although it has also been held that no such presumption may be relied on to establish plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence.¹⁶ In the case of minors, whether or not contributory negligence can be presumed may depend on their age and capacity and the obviousness of the danger.¹⁷ In any case a presumption of care on the part of plaintiff does not justify a presumption of negligence of defendant,¹⁸ and cannot prevail¹⁹ or even be indulged in²⁰ against evidence showing that the accident resulted from contributory negligence.

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, there is no presumption that the employee was negligent or knowingly incurred the risk which caused the injury.²¹ On the contrary, there is a presumption that plaintiff was exercising ordinary

- (9) Warning of danger
- (10) Assumption of risk
- (11) Contributory negligence

(1) In General

In an action against a master to recover for a servant's injuries the burden is on the plaintiff to establish his cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence; and the same rule applies in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

As in other actions, so in an action by a servant to recover from the master for personal injuries, the burden is on plaintiff to establish his cause of action²⁴ and on defendant to establish an affirmative defense.²⁵ Thus, plaintiff must prove the injury for which recovery is sought,²⁶ and must show that the accident was caused solely in the manner claimed.²⁷ Where the Federal Employers' Liability Act is set up in defense of a common-law action, it has been held that the burden is on plaintiff to establish a right of action at common law which has not been superseded by the federal statute,²⁸ that is to say, he must show that the federal statute is inapplicable.²⁹ On the other hand, however, there is authority holding that defendant must establish the applicability of the federal statute,³⁰ as for example, by showing that the injured employee was engaged in interstate commerce, where the cause of action is predicated on the theory that he was engaged in intra-state commerce.³¹

In case of a conflict of laws, the law of the state where the contract of employment is made governs as to the burden of proof in an action for personal injuries against a master by a servant.³²

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act and related statutes, the burden is on plaintiff to make out a prima facie case.³³ Thus, plaintiff has the burden of proving that he is entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the statute,³⁴ he must prove the relationship of master and servant, as discussed infra subdivision b (2) of this section, and that defendant owned and operated a common carrier railroad and was engaged in interstate or foreign commerce,³⁵ and that both plaintiff and the instrumentality causing the injury were at the time of the injury engaged in interstate commerce³⁶ or in work so closely related thereto as to be part thereof.³⁷ However, where the facts show that the case may have been within the statute, the initial burden on plaintiff is satisfied, and it is for defendant to show the contrary.³⁸ It is not defendant's duty to show how the accident occurred or what the injured employee was doing at the time thereof.³⁹

(2) Relationship of Master and Servant

Plaintiff has the burden of proving the relationship of master and servant, and that he was engaged in the master's business when he was injured.

The burden is on plaintiff to show such a state of facts as under the law of negligence constitutes the relation of master and servant,⁴⁰ and that he was engaged in the master's business when he was injured,⁴¹ but, where the act of a servant causing his injury was within the apparent scope of his authority, the master is charged with the burden of proving want of authority.⁴² Where plaintiff makes a prima facie showing that the relationship exists, the burden falls on defendant to establish his allegation that plaintiff was the employee of an independent contractor.⁴³

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, plaintiff has the burden of proving the relation of master and servant,⁴⁴ that when he was injured he was about the business of defendant,⁴⁵ that he was acting within the line of his employment,⁴⁶ and in the performance of some duty owing to defendant;⁴⁷ but, plaintiff having made a prima facie case in his favor, it is incumbent on defendant to prove facts in support of its defense that he was employed as an independent contractor.⁴⁸

(3) Negligence or Fault of Master Generally

The servant generally has the burden of proving the negligence of the master in an action for injuries.

In an action for personal injuries it is essential that the servant should prove the negligence of the master⁴⁹ in failing properly to perform a duty or tiff seeks to hold the master liable for the negligence of its physician in treating the injured servant, such negligence must be established,⁶³ but, where plaintiff makes out a prima facie case of the incompetency of the physician employed by defendant to attend him after his injury, the burden is on defendant to prove his competency.⁶⁴ Plaintiff has the burden of proving his allegation that defendant was negligent in failing to equip its hospital properly.⁶⁵

Knowledge of danger

(1) A servant, working in safe place with safe tools at time of injuries to his hands by contact with trichlorethylene in tank used for degreasing electric appliances manufactured by employer, could not recover damages from employer, in absence of proof that employer knew or should have known that trichlorethylene was dangerous and injurious to plaintiff's hands, as alleged in complaint—Huels v General Elec Co, 46 A 2d 654, 134 NJ Law 165

(2) An employee gored by employer's bull to recover from employer for injuries was required to show that the bull was an animal possessing a vicious propensity of which the employer had actual or constructive knowledge and that injury was brought about by breach of some duty owed by the employer to the employee—Hill v Moseley, 17 SE 2d 876, 220 NC 485

Duty to give warning

An employee suing employer for injuries allegedly resulting from employer's negligence in failing to warn employee of the danger must prove existence of danger, employer's actual or constructive knowledge of existence of risk, employee's lack of knowledge of danger, and employer's actual or constructive knowledge of employee's lack of appreciation of danger—*Marranick v. gence.⁵⁸ Since, as discussed supra subdivision a (2) of this section, no presumption of negligence ordinarily exists, negligence of the master must be affirmatively proved.⁵⁹ Where the action is predicated on a violation of the Federal Safety Appliance Act, proof of negligence on the part of the master is unnecessary,⁶⁰ since a violation of the statute constitutes negligence per se.⁶¹ In an action under the Boiler Inspection Act plaintiff is not required to prove negligence in the sense of lack of care,⁶² but merely the failure of the appliance causing the injury to function properly.⁶³

(4) Cause of Injury

The plaintiff has the burden of proving the manner and immediate cause of the injury, and must also prove that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause thereof; and the same burden rests on him in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

In an action against a master for injuries to a servant, plaintiff has the burden of proving the manner in which the injury occurred and the immediate cause which produced it,⁶⁴ and, having proved defendant's negligence, he has the further burden of proving that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury⁶⁵ in whole or in part.⁶⁶ Plaintiff is not required, however, to point out the precise ultimate act or omission which caused the accident⁶⁷ or to negative every other possible cause other than defendant's negligence,⁶⁸ but if it appears that the injury complained of may with equal likelihood have resulted from one of two or more causes, for one of which, and not the other, defendant is liable, plaintiff must show with reasonable certainty that the cause for which defendant is liable produced the result.⁶⁹

If plaintiff's evidence of cause establishes a prima facie case of negligence, the burden shifts to defendant to offer a reasonable explanation of the cause of the accident.⁷⁰ Thus where, by application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, discussed supra subdivision a (3) (c) of this section, plaintiff shows

prima facie that the injuries were caused by defendant's negligence, the burden is cast on defendant to show some other explanation of how the accident was caused at least equally conceivable and consistent with the proved and admitted facts,⁷¹ and this burden is not satisfied by mere proof of other probable causes and of the good condition of the instrumentality causing the injury.⁷² Where the action is brought under a state employers' liability act, plaintiff must show that the proximate cause of the injury was within the statute.⁷³

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act the burden is on plaintiff to show that defendants' negligence was, in whole or in part,⁷⁴ the proximate cause of the injury;⁷⁵ or, as it is sometimes stated, plaintiff must show the causal connection between defendant's negligence and the injury.⁷⁶ Where the accident may have resulted from one of two or more possible causes, for one of which, and not the other, defendant is liable, plaintiff must show that the cause for which defendant is liable produced the result.⁷⁷ Plaintiff also has the burden of proving the manner and the proximate physical cause of the injury,⁷⁸ although, apart from the necessity of showing defendant's negligence, he is not required to prove the precise ultimate cause thereof.⁷⁹ If, under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, the evidence establishes prima facie that the injury was caused by defendant's negligence, the burden rests on defendant to show that some other agency was the proximate cause of the injury.⁸⁰

burden is on plaintiff to prove that defendant's wrongful act or omission was the proximate cause of the injury.⁸¹

(5) Condition of Equipment or Place of Work

Generally the plaintiff has the burden of proving the defective or dangerous condition of equipment or place of work alleged to have caused the injury, that the defendant was negligent in causing or permitting such condition to exist, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury; and in an action predicated on a violation of the Federal Safety Appliance Act the plaintiff must prove the violation.

Where the action is to recover for an injury or death caused by reason of a defective machine or appliance, or an unsafe place of work, the burden is on plaintiff to prove that such defect or danger existed.⁸² He must further prove defendant's neg-

it was not carefully prepared and manufactured,⁹¹ or that the place of work was unsafe,⁹² but in at least one jurisdiction it has been held that the burden is on defendant to show that he did not know, and could not have known by the exercise of due diligence, that the instrumentality was defective.⁹³ Where the employer seeks to avoid liability on the ground that the employee had accepted a delegation of the duty to construct a safety appliance, the employer has the burden of showing such delegation,⁹⁴ he must show that negotiations with respect to such delegation had passed the permissive stage and that the employee had actually contracted to construct such appliance.⁹⁵ On the other hand, it has been held that the burden is on the servant, suing for injuries caused by his defective construction of temporary appliances for particular work, to adduce evidence from which the master's obligation to furnish such instrumentality in a completed state is reasonably inferable.⁹⁶

Plaintiff also has the burden of proving that such negligence on defendant's part was the proximate cause of the injury alleged, whether arising from defects in appliances,⁹⁷ or machinery,⁹⁸ or the place of work.⁹⁹

Under Federal Employers' Liability Act and related statutes. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act to recover for injuries on the theory that the place of work was unsafe, the burden is on plaintiff to show that the place of work was unsafe as a result of the negligent failure of defendant to do its duty with respect thereto¹ and that such negligence was in whole or in part the

Where defendant violated statute

Employer was bound to know of statutory duty to provide exhaust fans to carry off dust from dust-creating machinery, and that failure to perform such duty would constitute negligence per se for which it was bound to respond in damages if employee was injured thereby, hence employer could not urge a failure of proof that it had knowledge that employee was being exposed to silicosis in course of his employment, and that without such knowledge there could be no negligence in so exposing employee—Dalton Foundries v Jefferies, 51 NE 2d 13, 114 Ind App 271, followed in Dalton Foundries v Dean, 51 NE 2d 397, 114 Ind App 289

Notice of condition

(1) It has been held that, where an otherwise safe place to work has been rendered dangerous to railroad

proximate cause of the injury.³ Likewise, where it is claimed that the injury resulted from a defective tool or appliance, the burden is on plaintiff to prove that such defect existed,³ that defendant was negligent in furnishing him with, or permitting the use of, such unsafe equipment,⁴ that plaintiff used the equipment in the manner intended,⁵ and that the defect was the proximate cause of the injury.⁶ In an action for injury to plaintiff caused by a defective car, the burden of proof that the car was a foreign car was on defendant.⁷ Where plaintiff's right to recover is based on alleged failure of defendant to comply with the Federal Ash Pan Act he has the burden of proof of such failure.⁸

In a suit to recover for an injury caused by a violation of the Federal Safety Appliance Act, plaintiff has the burden of proving the violation,⁹ as by showing that the coupler¹⁰ or other appliance¹¹ in question failed to comply with the statutory requirements, and that its failure to operate was not due to plaintiff's fault.¹² However, although there is authority to the contrary,¹³ it has been held that, having proved the violation of the statute, plaintiff is not required to prove defendant's negligence¹⁴ or that the appliance or equipment was in other respects out of order or defective.¹⁵ It has been held that mere proof of the opening of an automatic coupler whereby plaintiff was injured is sufficient to permit the inference that defendant was negligent in failing to provide a coupler complying with the statutory requirements, and casts the burden on defendant to rebut such inference.¹⁶

employee by an object falling on track, or a hole or depression existing along tracks, employee must prove actual or constructive notice of condition to employer before employee can recover damages for injury sustained through existence of such condition—Matthews v Southern Pac Co, 59 P.2d 220, 15 Cal App. 2d 36.

(2) So too it has been held that in an action by a switching crew foreman against a carrier operating a railroad yard for injuries sustained when foreman allegedly stepped on a stick and fell while boarding a moving train during switching operation, the foreman must prove that the alleged condition of the yard had existed for a sufficient period of time to charge the carrier with constructive notice thereof or that the system of inspection throughout the yard was insufficient—*Waller v Northern Pac. Partial coupling

In action against railway company

In an action under the Federal Automatic Coupler Act of 1893, now part of the Federal Safety Appliance Act, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 1-7, defendant has the burden of proving that it is within the exception in favor of four-wheeled cars which is made by a proviso in the act,¹⁷ and failure of defendant to provide grab irons or hand holds as required by the act is prima facie negligence.¹⁸ Plaintiff, however, has the burden of proving that at the time of the accident he was engaged in moving cars then used in interstate traffic¹⁹ and that they were not equipped with automatic couplers as required by the statute.²⁰

In an action under the Federal Boiler Inspection Act for damages because of failure to keep a locomotive and appurtenances thereof in proper condition as required by the statute, the burden of proof rests on plaintiff to prove a violation of the statute²¹ and that such violation was the proximate cause of the injury.²² Having shown a violation of the statute, defendant is not required to prove defendant's negligence,²³ but it has also been held that, when a railroad company turns over to the engineer a locomotive in proper condition, plaintiff has the burden of showing that a defect developing in the course of its run was caused by the railroad company's negligence.²⁴

for death of brakeman as result of uncoupling of first car in moving freight train from engine tender, the burden was not on defendant to establish partial coupling which enabled train to run for considerable distance without separating—Vigor v Chesapeake & O R. Co., CCA Ind., 101 F.2d 865, certiorari denied Chesapeake & O R. Co. v. Vigor, 59 S.Ct. 1031, 307 U.S. 635, 83 L.Ed. 1617.

Where the master had furnished printed and written instructions for the guidance of plaintiff's fellow servants, by whose negligence he was injured, plaintiff had the burden of showing that the instructions had

(6) Methods of Work, Rules, and Orders

The plaintiff has the burden of proving his contention that the defendant was derelict in its duty to provide and enforce proper rules and instructions for the conduct of its work, or that the injured servant had a lawful reason for disobeying the orders of his superior; but the defendant must prove its defense that the injury was caused by the servant's violation of a company rule, and this is also true in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

Plaintiff has the burden of proving his contention that defendant was derelict in its duty to provide requisite rules and instructions for the conduct of its work²⁵ or to enforce rules adopted for the safety of employees.²⁶ So too he has the burden of proving his contention that the method of work prescribed by defendant was not reasonably safe²⁷ and that his injury was the result of a method which exposed him to an extraordinary risk.²⁸ Where the evidence shows that plaintiff was injured because of the negligent manner in which a particular operation was performed, he need not show that the manner in which it was done was different from the customary manner, since if the customary manner was negligent its observance would not excuse defendant.²⁹ A servant suing for injuries arising from an alleged negligent order by an authorized agent of the master has the burden of proving a duty and the breach thereof by such

In action by foreman for injuries due to employer's alleged failure to supply sufficient workmen to do work in safety, burden was on foreman to prove inadequacy of force to do work with such plans and precautions as were open to foreman—Seymour v. Holman, 158 So. 525, 229 Ala. 634.

agent.³⁰ Where plaintiff was injured by reason of defendant's violation of its alleged custom, the burden was on defendant to prove that for some legal and satisfactory reason the custom was not in force at the time of the accident.³¹

A servant who disobeys the orders of his superior takes on himself the burden of showing a lawful reason for such disobedience.³² So, where the evidence shows injury to plaintiff to have occurred through his violation of an established rule of the master, the burden is on plaintiff to show that he had no actual knowledge of the rule and that its existence had been so concealed or ineffectively published that he could not by the exercise of ordinary care on his part have acquired such knowledge.³³ Likewise, where a servant injured by reason of his disobedience of a rule promulgated by defendant contends that the rule had been so habitually disregarded with defendant's acquiescence as to amount to its suspension, he has the burden of proving that contention.³⁴ Nevertheless, if defendant relies for defense on plaintiff's violation of a rule, it has the burden of proving such rule,³⁵ and, where the rule is expressly subject to exception under stated circumstances, defendant has the burden of proving that such exception did not apply to plaintiff's case.³⁶

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, defendant has the burden of proof with respect to the defense that the injury to the employee was caused by his violation of a company rule³⁷ and that plaintiff's violation of the rule was the proximate cause of the injury.³⁸ Plaintiff, however, has the burden of proving that such rule was waived.³⁹ Where plaintiff depends for recovery on the violation of a custom or rule he must show such violation⁴⁰ and that he came within such custom or rule.⁴¹ In order to avoid the defense of assumption of risk, plaintiff must prove defendant's knowledge of the defect and promise to remedy it,⁴² or, if he contends that he was acting under his superior's direct orders, he must prove that such orders were given and that he was injured as a result of his efforts to carry them out substantially as given.⁴³ Where plaintiff relies on a local custom conflicting with a general rule of defendant, he must show that the alleged custom was actually known to all employees dealing with it.⁴⁴

(7) Incompetency or Negligence of Fellow Servants

Generally, where an action is predicated on the liability of the master for the negligence of another servant or employee, the plaintiff has the burden of proving such negligence and the scope of such servant's duty and authority; and, where it is claimed that the master was negligent in employing an incompetent servant, the plaintiff has the burden of proving such servant's incompetency and the defendant's negligence in employing him.

Where an action is predicated on the liability of the master for the negligence of another servant or employee, the burden is on plaintiff to show such servant's negligence⁴⁵ and to show the scope of his duties and authority⁴⁶. Where an action to recover for injuries caused by the wrongful act of an incompetent servant is based on the liability of the master for his own negligence in employing such a servant, plaintiff has the burden of proving the fact of incompetency⁴⁷ unless the fellow servant is an infant of tender years⁴⁸ or unless it appears that the employer failed to inquire into such fellow servant's fitness when his services were engaged,⁴⁹ and plaintiff must further prove that he did not know and in the exercise of ordinary care could not have known that the fellow servant was incompetent,⁵⁰ that the master was negligent in selecting such servant or in retaining him in the service after actual or constructive notice of his incompetency,⁵¹ and that the injury suffered by plaintiff was the proximate result of such incompetency.⁵²

Although there is considerable authority to the contrary,⁵³ it has frequently been held that the burden of establishing the relation of fellow servants between the injured servant and the servant whose negligence caused the injury, so as to relieve defendant from liability, is on defendant⁵⁴. Where plaintiff shows prima facie that the injury was caused by the act of an employee who was not a fellow servant, the burden is on defendant to prove that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant⁵⁵. In a jurisdiction in which it is held that the fellow-servant rule will not be presumed to obtain in another state, as discussed supra subdivision a (1) of this section, plaintiff is not required to prove that the rule has been abrogated in such state by statute⁵⁶.

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act to recover for an injury caused by the negligence of one alleged to be a servant of defendant, the burden is on plaintiff to prove that such person was a servant of defendant,⁵⁷ that he was negligent,⁵⁸ and that his acts were within the scope of his employment.⁵⁹ Where the negligence charged is that of the master in employing an incompetent servant whose act caused the injury, plaintiff has the burden of proving such incompetency⁶⁰ and that such incompetency was known to defendant or should, by the exercise of reasonable care, have been known.⁶¹

(8) Plaintiff's Knowledge or Understanding of Danger

In some jurisdictions it is held that defendant has the burden of proving the injured servant's knowledge of the defect which caused the injury, but in other jurisdictions plaintiff is held to have the burden of proving that he did not know of the defect or danger and could not have known thereof by the exercise of ordinary care.

In respect of the burden of proof as to knowledge by plaintiff of the defect causing his injury there is some conflict of authority,⁶² possibly arising, it has been intimated, from the conflicting rules respecting the burden of proof as to assumption of risk and contributory negligence,⁶³ although the servant's knowledge of the defect has by some authorities been regarded as an independent factor of plaintiff's case.⁶⁴ At any rate in some jurisdictions the burden of proof of such knowledge is on defendant.⁶⁵ In other jurisdictions plaintiff has the burden of proving that he did not know of the defect or danger and had not equal means of knowing with the master,⁶⁶ and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known thereof.⁶⁷ In at least one jurisdiction where the rule placing the burden on plaintiff is recognized it is held that the rule has no application in actions for the death of a servant.⁶⁸ Where a servant's want of knowledge of defects in appliances is not susceptible of direct proof, it may be inferred from circumstances, and he may be aided by the presumption that a person does not voluntarily incur danger.⁶⁹

It has been held that the burden of proof is on plaintiff to show that he did not know of the danger incident to his work,⁷⁰ but it has also been held that in respect of a nonobvious and an extraordinary risk the burden is on defendant to prove that plaintiff knew of it and appreciated the danger from it.⁷¹

Under Federal Employers' Liability Act. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act the burden of proving that plaintiff had actual or constructive knowledge of unsafe conditions surrounding his place of work was on defendant pleading assumption of risk.⁷² Where plaintiff is a minor, the burden of establishing his actual comprehension of the particular risk rests on defendant.⁷³ It has, however, been held that where plaintiff placed himself in a dangerous position he has the burden of proving that in the exercise of reasonable care he did not and could not have known of his danger.⁷⁴

Infant or incompetent servant. A minor plaintiff must prove his lack of experience or intelligence where his age is such as to repel a presumption in his favor.⁷⁵ So, if an infant servant, fourteen years of age or over, relies on his want of capacity to comprehend and avoid danger, the burden of proving it is on him, but, if under that age, the burden of proving capacity is on the master.⁷⁶ As expressed in one case, the burden of proving that a minor servant had more than the usual capacity of minors of the same age rests on the employer, and the burden of proving that he had less than the usual capacity rests on the person seeking to recover damages for his death.⁷⁷ In an action for the wrongful death of an employee by reason of his having been employed in a dangerous occupation despite his known mental incapacity, plaintiff has the burden of proof.⁷⁸

(9) Warning of Danger

As a general rule the plaintiff is held to have the burden of proving his contention that the defendant wrongfully failed to give him a warning of dangers attending his work, but in some instances the burden of proving that sufficient warning was given is held to rest on the defendant.

Where the gist of an action by a servant against the master is the alleged wrongful omission to give him a warning of dangers attending his work, the burden is on plaintiff to show that such warning was not given,⁷⁹ but it has been held that the burden is on defendant to prove that plaintiff was warned of the danger arising from a nonobvious and an extraordinary risk.⁸⁰ Even in the case of an infant servant it has been held that the burden is on plaintiff to prove his allegation that he was not warned of the dangers incident to the operation of a machine,⁸¹ although there is also authority to the contrary.⁸² Where a youthful and inexperienced servant was placed in charge of dangerous machinery and was injured thereby, the burden is on defendant master to show that those in authority warned him in such a manner that he fully appreciated the danger.⁸³ In a jurisdiction where the burden of proof of nonassumption of risk is on plaintiff, as discussed infra subdivision b (10) of this section, plaintiff must prove that he was not warned of a danger to which he was subjected that was wholly unnecessary to the operation of the master's business.⁸⁴ On the other hand, where the burden of proving assumption of risk is on defendant, defendant also has the burden of proving warning as a foundation for the defense of assumption of risk.⁸⁵

(10) Assumption of Risk

In some jurisdictions the burden is on the plaintiff to show that he did not assume the risk, while in other jurisdictions the burden of showing assumption of risk is on the defendant; and the latter rule applies in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

In a number of jurisdictions the burden of showing assumption of risk is on defendant,⁸⁶ at least

where this issue is an affirmative defense,⁸⁷ while in others the burden is on plaintiff to show that he did not assume the risk.⁸⁸ Regardless of which of these two conflicting views, when taken without qualification, is adhered to, it is generally agreed that where the evidence shows that the danger was one which ought not to have attended the servant's employment, but was caused by the negligence of the master, the burden of proving that the servant assumed it as a risk of his employment is on the master.⁸⁹ Defendant is relieved of the burden of proving assumption of risk where such assumption is shown by plaintiff's own evidence⁹⁰

risk is extraordinary,⁹⁶ notwithstanding a contrary rule in the state in a court of which the action is brought⁹⁷ and notwithstanding decisions to the contrary in actions not under the federal statute.⁹⁸ However, defendant is not compelled to establish the defense by his own evidence,⁹⁹ it is incumbent on plaintiff to present a case free from facts showing that the risk was one which had been assumed by him.¹

(11) Contributory Negligence

In some jurisdictions the plaintiff has the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence, but in a majority of jurisdictions the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant. The burden is on the defendant in actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

In some jurisdictions, in the absence of a statute requiring a different rule, the burden is on plaintiff to show by a preponderance of evidence that he was free from contributory negligence,² although it is not necessary that he should introduce evidence distinctly directed to that matter,³ and he is aided by the presumption arising from the instinct of self-preservation.⁴ In the majority of jurisdictions, however, in some instances by reason of statutes applicable to negligence actions generally, contributory negligence is regarded as an affirmative defense which must be proved by defendant;⁵ and this rule has been held not changed by a statute adopting the doctrine of comparative negligence⁶ or by a statute abolishing the fellow-servant rule.⁷ Defendant is not required to attach any blame to plaintiff until he himself has been shown to have been in fault;⁸ and he may be relieved of the burden of proving contributory negligence where it may be legitimately inferred from plaintiff's own showing.⁹ In some instances the burden of proof has been made to depend on the state of the pleadings.¹⁰

A rule requiring plaintiff to show that he was free from fault has been held to be a rule of substantive law and hence without applicability where an employee sues for an injury received in another state where no such doctrine prevails.¹¹ Where willful negligence of plaintiff is by statute made a complete defense, it must be proved by defendant.¹²

§ 502. — Effect of Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

The ordinary rules controlling presumptions and burden of proof in actions between master and servant have to some extent been affected in the various jurisdictions by constitutional and statutory provisions especially applicable thereto.

The ordinary rules relating to presumptions and burden of proof, discussed supra § 501, have been varied in a number of jurisdictions by constitutional or statutory provisions relating especially to master and servant cases¹⁷ Thus, under some statutes, plaintiff has the burden of affirmatively proving the servant's freedom from negligence,¹⁸ but under others the burden of proof of contributory negligence in an action against an employer for injuries to an employee rests on defendant¹⁹ Under some statutes, in an action for the death of a servant of a railroad company, on proof that the servant was killed by the running of locomotives or cars or other machinery of such company, or from an act done by some person in the employ and service of the company, a rebuttable²⁰ presumption²¹ arises that defendant was negligent; and, similarly, certain proof may by statute be made prima facie evidence of defendant's negligence.²² On the other hand, some statutory provisions expressly confirm the common-law rule that there is no presumption of the employer's negligence on proof of injury, but that the burden of proving negligence is on plaintiff²³

The subject of presumptions and burden of proof in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, as well as the effect of statutes relating to presumptions and burden of proof in negligence actions generally, are discussed supra § 501.

Under statutes requiring a master to guard dangerous machinery a servant suing for an injury caused by an unguarded machine has the burden of proving in the first instance that the machine was not guarded, as complained of in his pleading,²⁴ and that the injury was caused by such failure to comply with the statute,²⁵ and, if a protection of some sort is provided which plaintiff contends is not a proper or sufficient compliance with the statute, the burden is on him of proving that fact²⁶ However, proof that machinery is of the kind mentioned in the statute and is unguarded makes out a prima facie case of negligence.²⁷

According to some authorities plaintiff is under no burden to prove the availability or practicability of more sufficient devices or safeguards,²⁸ the burden being rather on defendant to prove that no guard was practicable which would have been reasonably calculated to prevent the accident²⁹ In other cases, however, it has been held that the burden is on plaintiff to show that it was practicable to guard the machine,³⁰ and it has been held that, where there is no question about the practicability

Dependent on whether duty absolute

(1) Where the statute makes it the absolute duty of the employer to provide the prescribed safeguards, plaintiff is not under the burden of proving availability or practicality—Boll v Condie-Bray Glass & Paint Co, 11 SW 2d 48, 321 Mo 92—Blittschau v American Car & Foundry Co, Mo App, 144 SW 2d 196

(2) Where, however, the statute requires safeguards when possible, of applying a guard, the omission to guard constitutes negligence per se,³¹ but that, where the practicability is in dispute, the burden is on plaintiff to show that it is feasible.³²

§ 503. Admissibility

The general rules governing the competency, relevancy, and materiality of evidence in civil actions apply in an action to recover from a master for personal injuries to a servant.

The general rules governing the competency, relevancy, and materiality of evidence in civil actions apply in an action to recover from a master for personal injuries to a servant,³³ as, for example, with respect to the determination of the admissibility of evidence offered for the purpose of establishing matters relating to the time³⁴ and location³⁵ of the accident and the surrounding circumstances³⁶. The written report of an accident made by one who did not witness it is generally inadmissible.³⁷ While it has been held that reports required by statute to be made are admissible to establish the facts required to be reported,³⁸ the contrary has also been held.³⁹ The fact that no official report of the accident was made is not admissible.⁴⁰

Liability insurance. The fact that an employer is insured against loss from injuries to his employees is in itself inadmissible on the issue of his negligence.⁴¹ However, a conversation between the parties on the subject may be admissible as tending to prove defendant's admission of liability,⁴² and other facts connected therewith may be admissible to affect the credibility,⁴³ or to show the bias,⁴⁴ of a witness.

Interstate character of employee's work at time of injury. In suits brought against an employer for injuries suffered by his employee in the course of his employment, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act and other federal statutes, any evidence, otherwise competent, is admissible which tends to prove the fact that the employee was engaged in interstate commerce at the time he sustained the injury.⁴⁵

§ 504. — Employment or Relation of Master and Servant

Any evidence, otherwise competent, is admissible in an action by a servant against his master to recover for personal injuries which tends to prove or disprove the fact of employment.

In an action by a servant against his master to recover for personal injuries, any evidence, otherwise competent, is admissible which tends to prove⁴⁶ or disprove⁴⁷ the fact of employment. Thus it has been held permissible to prove the contract of employment,⁴⁸ the authority of the person hiring,⁴⁹ the instruction of the servant,⁵⁰ the authority to direct of the person giving directions,⁵¹ and the payment of wages⁵² or hospital dues⁵³. Also evidence of indemnity⁵⁴ or liability⁵⁵ insurance taken by defendant, has been held admissible. Facts tending to show defendant's control over the business,⁵⁶ his liability for the wages of other employees⁵⁷ or whether he was reimbursed for monies paid to employees,⁵⁸ and who supplied material for work to a fellow employee⁵⁹ have been held admissible Evidence of a statement by defendant's agent that he is the employer⁶⁰ or will be responsible for injuries⁶¹ has likewise been held admissible Evidence that a customary furlough was not given by a general employer to the injured employee while working for a special employer has been held admissible to determine whether such employee knew of the change of employers.⁶²

Competent evidence tending to show whether the injured person was employed by defendant, or by an independent contractor, or was himself an independent contractor, at the time of the injury is admissible⁶³ Thus evidence that defendant carried sickness and accident insurance on its servants and made deductions from their wages to pay the premiums thereon has been held admissible as to whether plaintiff was an employee or an independent contractor at the time of the injury⁶⁴ Also a compensation policy, maintained by one who defendant claims acted as an independent contractor solely responsible for plaintiff's injuries, has been held admissible to show that such person acted as defendant's agent and not as an independent contractor.⁶⁵

§ 505. — Nature, Cause, and Extent of Injury

Relevant, competent, and material evidence as to the nature, cause, and extent of the servant's injury is admissible.

Evidence having some bearing on the cause of the accident,⁶⁶ tending to show that it was due⁶⁷ or not due⁶⁸ to defendant's negligent act, or was attributable to some cause other than defendant's negligence,⁶⁹ has been held admissible or inadmissible depending on its relevancy or irrelevancy to those issues. Evidence tending to show the cause of the accident will not be excluded on the ground that the negligence testified to has not been charged in the complaint⁷⁰

Competent evidence bearing on the nature⁷¹ and extent⁷² of the accident, or on the nature⁷³ and extent⁷⁴ of plaintiff's injuries resulting therefrom, is admissible.

Relation of employer to cause of injury Evidence bearing on the relation of the employer to the cause of the injury is admissible, as, for example, any evidence tending to prove that the negligent person was in his employ at the time,⁷⁵ and that

§ 506. — Negligence of Employer in General

Any evidence, otherwise competent, relevant to the issues as to the negligence of the employer is ordinarily admissible.

Any evidence, otherwise competent, relevant to the issues as to the negligence involved is ordinarily admissible to establish or disprove the negligence complained of⁷⁸

§ 507. — Care of Inexperienced or Youthful Employee

In an action against a master to recover for injuries to an inexperienced or youthful servant, any competent evidence is admissible which tends to prove or disprove the servant's inexperience, youth, and mental capacity, and evidence bearing on the employer's duty and failure to protect the employee is admissible.

In an action to recover for injuries to an inexperienced or youthful servant, any competent evidence is admissible which tends to show or disprove the servant's inexperience⁷⁹ or youth,⁸⁰ his mental capacity,⁸¹ or his knowledge or ignorance of the danger.⁸² Evidence may also be admissible to show the employer's knowledge of his employee's youth or inexperience,⁸³ and evidence bearing on his duty and failure to protect the employee, as, for example, facts relating to the existence and nature of the danger and the consequent duty to warn,⁸⁴ the custom of defendant⁸⁵ or of others in the same kind of business⁸⁶ to take or not to take precautions, the taking or failing to take precautions at the time of the accident,⁸⁷ and the giving or failing to give the proper warnings or instructions.⁸⁸ Evidence of experience or inexperience is immaterial where there is no evidence in the case of the employee's due care and of the employer's negligence.⁸⁹

§ 508. — Violations of Statutes or Ordinances

The employment of a servant by a master in violation of a statute is competent evidence of the negligence of the master.

The employment of a servant by a master in violation of a statute is competent evidence of the negligence of the master.⁹⁰ Thus, in an action for injuries suffered by an infant employee of defendant, evidence as to whether defendant employed the infant in violation of a statute governing the employment of minors ordinarily is admissible,⁹¹ and it has been held that the violation of such a statute

Evidence held admissible

(1) A minor employee who is injured while being employed in violation of a statute limiting the number of hours per week for which he can legally be employed is entitled to have such fact considered by jury in determining the employer's liability is evidence, or evidence per se, of negligence⁹³

The rule has also been applied to the admissibility of evidence showing whether an employer violated a statute or ordinance providing for the guarding of dangerous machinery⁹⁴ and places,⁹⁴ or for the regulation of dangerous occupations,⁹⁵ such as mining,⁹⁶ railroading,⁹⁷ and blasting⁹⁸

Official reports

In action for injuries received by employee as result of employer's violation of factory act by failing to provide proper ventilation of rooms wherein dangerous gases were used, to his servant, competent evidence may be admitted to show the condition of the master's machinery, appliances, or places for work before and after the injury, where such condition is shown, or may be presumed, to have existed at the time of the accident.

In an action against a master for personal injuries to his servant, competent evidence may be admitted to show the condition of the master's machinery, appliances, or places for work before and after the injury, where such condition is shown, or may be presumed, to have existed at the time of the accident⁹⁹ However, it has been held that un-reports of department of labor and industries inspectors stating that ventilation in factory was good were relevant as laying foundation for inference that employer did not violate factory act as alleged—Grant v. Fisher Flouring Mills Co., supra

Continuing negligence

Evidence as to the condition, before and after the injury of the employee, of an entry to a place of work, at which entry the employee was injured, has been held competent as showing continuing negligence on the part of the employer—

less there is proof that conditions were the same at the time of the inspection as at the time of the accident to the employee,¹ or unless the inspection and discovery occurred so shortly before or subsequent to the accident that a reasonable presumption would arise that the conditions had not been changed,² evidence of such conditions is not admissible. In the case of a suit against an employer based on injuries caused by an occupational disease of his employee, it has been held that evidence of conditions existing at the place of work may take a wide range in time,³ especially where the conditions giving rise to the claimed injuries and the nature thereof are obscure.⁴

Before injury. In an action against a master for personal injuries to his servant, competent evidence may be admitted to show the condition of the master's machinery, appliances, or places for work previous to the injury, where such condition is shown, or may be presumed, to have continued up to the time of the accident,⁵ or where there is evidence to show what changes, if any, have been made in the meantime.⁶ Where, however, the conditions are constantly changing the evidence is not admissi-

ble.⁷ On issues other than defendant's negligence, evidence of the conditions prior to the accident, unless too remote,⁸ may be admissible, as, for example, in rebuttal of the claims of either plaintiff⁹ or defendant,¹⁰ to explain the nature of repairs to a machine before the accident, where their nature and sufficiency are in issue,¹¹ or to show the dangerous character of the appliance or place,¹² or the employer's knowledge of the defect or danger,¹³ or his willfulness in continuing it.¹⁴

After injury. Where, in an action against a master for personal injuries to his servant, the condition of the master's machinery, appliances, or places of work, as it appeared after the accident occurred, may be presumed to have existed at the time of the accident,¹⁵ or where such subsequent condition is shown to be the same, or substantially the same, as the condition existing at the time of the accident,¹⁶ evidence of such condition usually is admissible. Ordinarily, however, in order to be admissible, the evidence should deal with conditions as they appeared within a reasonable time after the accident,¹⁷ and the machinery, appliances, or places of work concerning which the evidence is offered

Evidence of conditions as they appeared subsequent to the accident is not admissible where it is shown that conditions are not the same,¹⁹ or that they are constantly changing,²⁰ or where there is no presumption or proof or offer of proof of unchanged conditions.²¹ If the nature and extent of the intervening changes²² or the fact of their immateriality²³ is shown, evidence of the later condition is admissible. A change in conditions taking place at the time of the accident and caused thereby is not admissible, in the absence of evidence showing that the described condition was due to the causes alleged.²⁴ Evidence as to what was done with the machinery after the accident in question has been held inadmissible.²⁵

Evidence of conditions after the injury is admissible to contradict or control evidence as to such condition already introduced by the other party²⁶ or to explain inconsistencies in the testimony of witnesses of the party offering it.²⁷ The practicability of guarding a machine may be shown by evidence that it was guarded while being operated for several months after the injury, without injury to other employees.²⁸

§ 510. — Precautions against Recurrence of Injury

As a general rule evidence that after the accident the employer took precautions against its recurrence is not admissible to show his negligence.

Evidence that after the accident the employer took precautions against its recurrence is generally held not to be admissible to show his negligence.²⁹

Conflicting reports

Inspection reports made one day after the accident showing a defect in an appliance on a train causing the injury are admissible, although similar reports made on the day of the accident showed no such defect, and although a trip intervened between the two sets of reports, in view of the fact that the first set of reports was made without a special inspection.—*Scott v Baltimore & O. but there is also some authority to the contrary³⁰

On other issues or for other purposes, depending on the circumstances, such evidence has been held admissible,³¹ as, for example, in rebuttal of the claims or evidence of the other party,³² or to test the credibility of a witness³³ or the accuracy of a map³⁴. Such evidence has also been held admissible to show the possibility of producing certain parts of a machine in court,³⁵ to fix the time of an examination of the premises,³⁶ to reconcile the condition of a place or appliance in question at the time of the trial with that at the time of the accident,³⁷ to show changed conditions after the accident,³⁸ or to show the conditions³⁹ or the methods of work used⁴⁰ at the time of the accident, if not too remote.⁴¹

It has been held that such evidence is admissible to corroborate other evidence of a defective condition⁴² and to show the possibility of correcting it,⁴³ to prove the cause of the accident,⁴⁴ or to show whose duty it was to make the repairs,⁴⁵ or to show the possibility⁴⁶ or practicability⁴⁷ of guarding appliances or places, where the statute requires guards in such contingency, although there is authority for the position that the evidence is not admissible for this purpose.⁴⁸ If the guard was installed without defendant's authority, the evidence is not admissible.⁴⁹ Where any of these issues or purposes are obviously used as a mere pretext for the admission of such evidence, and the real purpose is to show the negligence of defendant before or at the time of the accident, the evidence will be excluded.⁵⁰

Repairs not constituting admission by defendant. Where the subsequent repairs or changes have no relation whatever to the defect alleged to have caused plaintiff's injuries,⁵¹ or where they are made for some other reason than to protect the employees,⁵² or where they are merely a temporary expedient and not permanent construction,⁵³ the evidence is admissible.

Absence of repairs or changes. Evidence offered by defendant that no repairs or changes of any consequence were made after the accident is not admissible.⁵⁴

§ 511. — Similar Facts and Occurrences

a. In general

b. Evidence of injuries, or accidents resulting in injuries, to others

a. In General

Evidence of facts, occurrences, or accidents happening at another time are admissible if relevant to the issue and if a substantial similarity in the essential conditions exists, but, where the necessary prerequisites are not shown, and the relevancy and the similarity of essential conditions are not proved, such evidence is not admissible.

Evidence of facts, occurrences, or accidents happening at another time are admissible if relevant to the issue and if a substantial similarity in the essential conditions exists.⁵⁵ Such evidence has been held admissible to show the cause of plaintiff's injuries,⁵⁶ or the authority⁵⁷ or incompetency⁵⁸ of the negligent workman. Likewise, evidence of similar facts and occurrences has also been held admissible to show the existence or the extent of the defective or dangerous condition causing the injury,⁵⁹

the employer's knowledge or his duty to know of the defect or danger, or of the existing perils,⁶⁰ or the duty of the employer to make repairs.⁶¹

Evidence of facts, occurrences, or accidents happening at another time has also been held admissible to show the adequacy of the appliance for the work,⁶² the necessity of taking precautions by the employer,⁶³ the practicability of guarding appliances or places,⁶⁴ or the possibility of guarding them more effectively.⁶⁵ Such evidence has likewise been held admissible to show the customary⁶⁶ or prior⁶⁷ methods of work, and the employer's willfulness in the violation of a statute.⁶⁸ Where such evidence tends to rebut the claims or evidence of the other party, it is admissible for that purpose.⁶⁹

It has been held that evidence as to specific instances of other and similar acts of alleged negligence is not, as a general rule, competent,⁷⁰ so that where the necessary prerequisites are not shown, and the relevancy and the similarity of essential conditions are not proved, the evidence is not admissible.⁷¹

Evidence showing that no other similar accident ever happened where the injury sued for occurred, or because of the appliance allegedly causing the injury, has been held inadmissible.⁷² It has further been held that defendant may not show that no similar accident has happened within a period of time testified to at the place where the injury occurred or because of the appliance used at the time of the injury,⁷³ but the contrary has also been held.⁷⁴ Evidence that others had performed the task at which plaintiff was injured without injury has been held inadmissible to excuse the employer's failure to furnish a safe place of work.⁷⁵ Also evidence tending to show that no one other than plaintiff had ever been injured by other appliances of the same kind has been held inadmissible.⁷⁶ However, in an action to recover for disability caused by an occupational disease, evidence has been held admissible to show that employees other than plaintiff working under the same conditions have not been so injured to support other evidence by defendant that plaintiff is not affected as claimed.⁷⁷

b. Evidence of Injuries, or Accidents Resulting in Injuries, to Others

Evidence of injuries to others in defendant's employ, or other accidents resulting in such injuries, is admissible if it has any tendency to prove the issue and if there is a substantial similarity in the essential conditions.

Evidence of injuries to others in defendant's employ, or other accidents resulting in such injuries, is admissible if it has a tendency to prove the issue and if there is a substantial similarity in the essential conditions.⁷⁸ Such evidence has been held admissible to prove the cause of the accident or injury,⁷⁹ the defective or dangerous condition,⁸⁰ and defendant's knowledge of or duty to know such condition,⁸¹ and his failure to use the care required under the circumstances.⁸²

Evidence of injuries to others in defendant's employ, or other accidents resulting in such injuries, is not admissible where the relevancy of the evidence, or similarity of conditions, or the proximity of time, is not shown,⁸³ and evidence of accidents or injuries subsequent to the accident or injury complained of is not admissible to prove knowledge on the part of the employer of the defect or condition on which his negligence is predicated.⁸⁴ However, testimony elicited on cross-examination of a

Evidence of a similar but unconnected negligent occurrence is incompetent to prove carelessness, so that, in action to recover for injuries sustained because of employer's negligent failure to instruct employee on safe method of work, testimony by employee who took plaintiff's place at machine that he was not given such instructions has been held incompetent to prove carelessness—Blais v Flanders Hardware Co, 42 A2d 332, 93 NH 370.

§ 512. — Defective or Dangerous Machinery, Appliances, and Places

- a. In general
- b. General practice or custom
- c. Inspections, repairs, and tests
- d. Knowledge by employer of defect or danger

a. In General

Evidence, otherwise competent, of any facts tending to establish or disprove negligence on the part of an employer in failing to provide reasonably safe and suitable machinery, appliances, and places for work may be admitted.

Evidence, otherwise competent, of any facts tending to establish or disprove negligence on the part of an employer in failing to provide reasonably safe and suitable machinery, appliances, and places for work may be admitted,⁸⁶ as, for example, evidence tending to show where plaintiff was working

when injured,⁸⁷ the authority of a foreman,⁸⁸ or the existence, nature, extent, and performance, generally, of defendant's duty to plaintiff.⁸⁹ So too competent evidence may be admitted as to the actual conditions existing at the time of the accident,⁹⁰ the surrounding circumstances,⁹¹ and the causal connection of the existing conditions with the injuries received by plaintiff,⁹² the proper methods or appliances under the existing conditions,⁹³ or the possibility or practicability of using better methods or appliances than those employed at the time of the accident.⁹⁴

Only competent, relevant, and material evidence may be admitted,⁹⁵ and evidence is not admissible where it has no relation to the conditions existing at the time⁹⁶ or place⁹⁷ of the accident or injury to plaintiff or defendant's duty thereunder.⁹⁸ Likewise evidence having no relation to the facts relied on by plaintiff as constituting negligence is not admissible,⁹⁹ and where plaintiff's own explanation of how the accident occurred renders such evidence immaterial it is not admissible.¹ Similarly, evidence is not admissible which has no relation to the form of action brought by plaintiff,³ or to the cause of the accident,³ or to a cause for which defendant is liable.⁴ Evidence tending to prove an admitted or established fact is not admissible.⁵

b. General Practice or Custom

Competent evidence of a general practice or custom of others in the same business as the defendant, or of the defendant himself, under similar conditions or circumstances, has been held admissible on the question of his exercise of due care in providing reasonably safe and suitable instrumentalities or places for work.

Evidence, otherwise admissible, of a general practice or custom of others in the same business as defendant, under substantially similar conditions or circumstances, has been held admissible on the question of his exercise of due care in providing reasonably safe instrumentalities or places for work.⁶ Thus evidence has been held admissible to show what safeguards or safety devices are customarily used by others in the same business as defendant,⁷ as well as to show the practicability⁸ or impracticability⁹ of such guards, or the suitability of equipment for the purpose for which it was used.¹⁰ The inquiry should be limited to the custom of well regulated and prudently managed businesses,¹¹ and to competent evidence showing a general practice or custom,¹² or a custom of which defendant had knowledge.¹³ Evidence of customary methods of other establishments may be admissible in rebuttal.¹⁴

There is authority holding that evidence of customary methods pursued in other similar establishments may be offered by defendant to disprove negligence,¹⁵ but not, as a rule, to make out plaintiff's case,¹⁶ and such proof has been held to be admissible on behalf of an injured plaintiff only when it tends to show that the customary method pursued in the employer's establishment is not only unusual but more dangerous in itself than the ordinary one,¹⁷ or that the adoption of the safer method was practicable in defendant's business,¹⁸ or that defendant promised to change his method.¹⁹ It has also been held that the admission of such evidence is discretionary with the court.²⁰ There is some authority for the proposition that evidence that the type of device used by defendant is the usual type used by other well-regulated establishments in the same business is inadmissible.²¹

Evidence of the character under consideration is not admissible in the absence of a showing of similar conditions as a basis for an inference of de-defendant's negligence,²² or where it is not related to the issue,²³ or where the custom offered in evidence is obviously no excuse for the negligent conduct of defendant²⁴

Custom in employer's business. Evidence as to the custom followed in defendant's business may be admitted if material and relevant to the issue,²⁵ otherwise it is not admissible.²⁶

c. Inspections, Repairs, and Tests

Competent evidence which is relevant to issues with respect to inspections, repairs, and tests is admissible.

Competent evidence which is relevant to an issue with respect to inspections of appliances and places of work is admissible²⁷ Accordingly, evidence is admissible to establish the employer's duty to inspect,²⁸ the proper methods of inspection,²⁹ and what a proper inspection would disclose³⁰ Such evidence has also been held admissible to show the general custom as to inspection in other similar establishments³¹ or rules providing therefor in the employer's business³² Similarly evidence of this nature may be admitted to show the making of,³³ or the failure to make,³⁴ an inspection, as well as the sufficiency of inspections made,³⁵ and the making of,³⁶ or the failure to make,³⁷ a report, and the effect of a report³⁸ Evidence has also been held admissible to show the necessity of an inspection as the basis for expert testimony.³⁹

Inspection by government agents. The admissibility of evidence as to inspections by government agents depends on its competency and relevancy to the issues involved, as, for example, evidence as to the making⁴⁰ and sufficiency⁴¹ of such inspections, their frequency,⁴² the agents' recommendations based on such inspections,⁴³ or the absence of such recommendations⁴⁴ So also the admissibility of evidence as to their reports⁴⁵ and certificates,⁴⁶ notices of existing defective conditions,⁴⁷ the public records of such inspections,⁴⁸ and their testimony at the trial based on such inspections,⁴⁹ depends on its competency and relevancy to the issues involved.

Repairs and tests. Competent evidence which is relevant to an issue with respect to repairs is admissible,⁵⁰ such as evidence involving such matters as the necessity of frequent repairs,⁵¹ and the making of,⁵² or failure to make,⁵³ repairs. The same rule applies to evidence involving such matters as the making of,⁵⁴ or failure to make,⁵⁵ a test, what a proper test would disclose,⁵⁶ and the employer's custom with reference thereto⁵⁷ Evidence as to the place where repairs are made, when that is material,⁵⁸ their sufficiency,⁵⁹ and the possibility of remedying defects thereby⁶⁰ has also been held admissible.

d. Knowledge by Employer of Defect or Danger

Competent and relevant evidence is admissible to prove that the defendant knew or ought to have known of the defect or danger causing the injury of which complaint is made.

Competent evidence tending to prove that defendant knew or ought to have known of the defect or danger is admissible,⁶¹ as, for example, that a warning or complaint was made to the employer⁶² or to his representative,⁶³ or that his representative's attention was drawn to the danger⁶⁴ Evidence that a report to defendant employer or his representative of the conditions disclosing the danger had been made,⁶⁵ that defendant was notified of the defect by others before the injury,⁶⁶ or that defendant's representative had been informed by another that he had trouble with the appliance causing the injury⁶⁷ has been held admissible.

Evidence that the dangerous condition causing the injury had been the subject of a conversation before the time of the accident between the employer's representative and another⁶⁸ or between outsiders in the presence of the employer's representative,⁶⁹ or that the employer made an admission of such knowledge either by his own words⁷⁰ or conduct⁷¹ or through the admission by words⁷² or conduct⁷³ of his representative, has been held admissible. So too evidence that the defect or danger was obvious⁷⁴ or its existence generally understood among the employees⁷⁵ or others,⁷⁶ or that there were other circumstances in the case clearly indicating a duty on the part of the employer to know the conditions,⁷⁷ has been held admissible.

Evidence is not admissible which has no tendency to show defendant's knowledge of the particular defect⁷⁸ or dangerous condition,⁷⁹ or the existence of facts relieving him of his obligation to know,⁸⁰ or where the uncontroverted evidence shows that defendant's representative is not chargeable with knowledge of the particular danger to which the offered evidence relates.⁸¹ Where the evidence offered indicates that knowledge of the danger first came to defendant after the accident it is not admissible.⁸² or disprove the defendant's negligence as to methods of work, rules, and orders in his business may be admitted.

Competent evidence of any facts tending to prove

Competent evidence of any facts which tend to show negligence or the absence thereof on the part of defendant with respect to methods of work, rules, and orders in his business may be admitted, as, for example, evidence of facts relative to the duties of particular employees,⁸³ or evidence explanatory of the methods used,⁸⁴ as well as evidence of facts tending to show the insufficiency of such methods,⁸⁵ or of facts tending to prove defendant's responsibility therefor.⁸⁶ Also, evidence of facts bearing on defendant's duty to promulgate rules,⁸⁷ as well as evidence of the rules themselves, where relevant to the issues,⁸⁸ and of facts showing their construction,⁸⁹ may be admitted. So, too, evidence of any orders given by defendant which are relevant to the issue,⁹⁰ and of facts bearing on the question whether the orders given were authorized,⁹¹ may be admitted.

Evidence as to methods of work is not admissible where not relevant to the issue,⁹² or where it does not tend to show that such methods had any causal connection with plaintiff's injuries,⁹³ or where its relevancy is dependent on other evidence not offered in proof,⁹⁴ or where the rejected testimony has already been admitted in another form.⁹⁵ Thus, evidence of facts relative to the duties of particular employees, where not relevant to the issue, is inadmissible.⁹⁶ So, too, evidence of rules where not relevant to the issues,⁹⁷ or not sufficiently proved,⁹⁸ or not shown to be in force,⁹⁹ or void,¹ or not posted when the statute requires it,² or when posted after the injury,³ is not admissible. Also, evidence as to oral rules has been held not admissible.⁴ In like manner, evidence of orders given by defendant in his business, which are not relevant to the issue, is not admissible.⁵

Customary methods. Evidence, otherwise admissible, of what is the usual method of work, either with defendant or others in the same business, under similar conditions, where such evidence has a tendency to show or disprove defendant's negligence,⁶ or to contradict the contentions of the other party,⁷ may be admitted. Competent evidence of the customary disregard of a rule is admissible to show its abrogation.⁸ While the fact that a master used a method of work customarily adopted by others in the same business has been held not to render inadmissible evidence of better methods,⁹ ordinarily, evidence of a method of work not shown to be customary,¹⁰ or evidence of a custom irrelevant to the issue,¹¹ or tending to prove an established fact,¹² or of a custom instituted after the accident,¹³ or in contravention of a rule of law,¹⁴ is not admissible.

Operation of railroads These rules frequently have been applied with respect to the admission or the exclusion of evidence as to the operation of railroads,¹⁵ as, for example, with respect to the admissibility of evidence as to the ordinary practice or custom relative thereto,¹⁶ as well as to the admissibility of evidence as to the rules of a railroad

§ 514. — Warning and Instructing Employee

Competent and relevant evidence of any facts tending to establish or negative defendant's negligence in failing to give reasonable and proper warning and instruction to the injured employee with regard to the dangers of the employment is admissible.

Competent and relevant evidence may be admitted of any facts which tend to establish or negative defendant's negligence in failing to give reasonable and proper warning and instruction to the injured employee with regard to the dangers of the employment,²⁶ as, for example, facts bearing on defendant's duty to warn,²⁷ the giving,²⁸ or failure to give,²⁹ a warning, and the nature³⁰ and the adequacy³¹ of the warning. While it has been held that evidence of defendant's custom with respect to warnings is admissible,³² it has also been held that evidence of a custom to warn is not admissible.³³

It has been held not permissible to show that other employees had been warned or instructed,³⁴ or that plaintiff had been warned on other occasions,³⁵ or that he had not been warned on the present occasion if it appears that he knew the danger.³⁶ In the absence of evidence that defendant knew or should have known of the danger, evidence of his failure to warn the injured employee has been held not admissible to charge him with negligence.³⁷ Evidence as to what an employee's instructions were with respect to a given duty is inadmissible where the injury complained of did not occur while he was performing such duty.³⁸ Likewise, it is not permissible to show whether plaintiff would have conducted himself at the time of the accident as he did, if he had known or had been warned of the danger.³⁹

Where the employee's injury is alleged to have resulted from his master's failure to provide a sufficient number of men for the work, evidence may be admitted to show the insufficiency of the force, and that defendant had notice of the fact⁴⁰ The number of men customarily used by defendant on the particular work has been held admissible,⁴¹ but the custom of other establishments is not admissible in the absence of evidence of similarity of conditions.⁴²

§ 516. — Employment or Retention of Incompetent Employees

- a. In general
- b. Employer's knowledge of incompetency
- c. Other acts of negligence
- d. Habits and reputation

a. In General

Evidence tending to show incompetency on the part of another workman resulting in the employee's injuries, and the employer's knowledge of, or duty to know of, such incompetency is admissible; but the mere fact that a servant is retained in, or discharged from, the service after the accident is not admissible on the question of his competency.

ble,⁴³ as, for example, evidence relating to the requirements of the position,⁴⁴ complaints made about the workman,⁴⁵ or conduct equivalent to a complaint,⁴⁶ as well as the result of investigations following the complaint.⁴⁷ So, too, competent evidence relating to the conduct of the workman at the time,⁴⁸ or any peculiarities or unusualness in his previous appearance or conduct,⁴⁹ his mental capacity,⁵⁰ and his experience,⁵¹ and defendant's records of his work,⁵² has been held admissible.

The evidence must be relevant,⁵³ and is inadmissible where it has no tendency to show the competency⁵⁴ or incompetency⁵⁵ of the particular workman whose acts caused plaintiff's injuries, or, as discussed infra subdivision b of this section, defendant's knowledge of his incompetency, or the negligent act of employing such a workman at the time and place of the injury.⁵⁶ Evidence of incompetency is not admissible where plaintiff's injuries were due to causes other than the workman's incompetency.⁵⁷

Retention or discharge after accident. The mere fact that a servant is retained in, or discharged from, the service after an accident is not admissible on the question of his competency,⁵⁸ but may be admitted to contradict the evidence of the other party.⁵⁹ As discussed infra § 517, competent evidence showing that he is not discharged, suspended, or reprimanded is admissible to disprove the defense that plaintiff's injuries were due to the negligence of a fellow servant, or as characterizing the

Evidence, otherwise admissible, may be admitted to show the defendant's knowledge of a servant's incompetency.

As tending to show defendant's knowledge of an employee's incompetency, it is permissible to show prior acts of insubordination and wilful disobedience of orders,⁶¹ knowledge on the part of defendant's foreman of such conduct,⁶² also declarations of defendant's foreman, provided there is independent evidence of the workman's incompetency.⁶³ Since the exact issue is not whether the employer believed his employee competent, but whether he was justified in so believing, it has been held that a question asked of the employer whether he had any knowledge or belief that the workman was not competent is inadmissible.⁶⁴ The fact that the workman had been given derogatory nicknames is not admissible to show the employer's knowledge of his incompetency.⁶⁵

c. Other Acts of Negligence

Evidence of prior specific acts of a fellow servant is generally held to be admissible on the question of his competency, provided it is also shown that the defendant knew or ought to have known of such prior acts.

Although there is some authority to the contrary,⁶⁶ it has generally been held that evidence of prior specific acts of a fellow servant is admissible on the question of his competency,⁶⁷ even though such negligent acts differ somewhat from the negligent act which caused the injury, provided they are of similar character,⁶⁸ where it is shown that such acts were known, or ought to have been known, to the employer,⁶⁹ and proof of actual notice to the employer⁷⁰ or to his foreman⁷¹ is not required. In the absence of evidence that defendant knew or ought to have known of the prior acts, the evidence is not admissible.⁷² Where prior negligent acts are admitted to show incompetency, it follows that defendant may introduce evidence to rebut the inferences to be drawn therefrom.⁷³

Competent and relevant evidence of an employee's habits and reputation indicating his unsuitability for the work to which he was assigned may be admitted to show the defendant's negligence in employing him for that purpose.

Competent and relevant evidence of an employee's habits, rendering him unsuitable for the work to which he was assigned, may be admitted to show negligence of the master in employing him for that purpose, as, for example, evidence that the employee was habitually careless,⁷⁴ or forgetful,⁷⁵ or intoxicated.⁷⁶ As a general rule, evidence of an employee's general reputation for competency in the particular line of work in which he was employed may be admitted, when the negligence of the employer in hiring him or retaining him in his employment is in issue,⁷⁷ as is true also of evidence as to his reputation for particular traits entering into the question of his fitness for the work, as, for example, inattention,⁷⁸ carelessness,⁷⁹ recklessness,⁸⁰ malicious conduct,⁸¹ or intoxication⁸²

It has been held that evidence of his reputation is not admissible to prove the workman's incompetency, but only defendant's knowledge of such incompetency, after the incompetency has been established by other evidence of specific acts⁸³ The general character of the workman, as distinguished from his reputation for traits which have a bearing on the case,⁸⁴ and his reputation for traits which have no relation whatever to the cause of the accident,⁸⁵ or to the issues of the case,⁸⁶ are not admissible. In showing the general reputation of a servant among those who worked with him, evidence of their actions and what they gave as their reasons when they refused to work with him is admissible.⁸⁷

Competent and relevant evidence as to the negligence of a fellow servant may be admitted.

Subject to the general rules as to competency and relevancy, evidence as to the relationship between plaintiff and the coemployee whose negligent act is alleged to have caused the injury is admissible,⁸⁸ as is evidence to show to whom the negligent act is attributable,⁸⁹ or to show that the act of a coemployee is to be regarded as the act of defendant,⁹⁰ or to disprove the negligence of the fellow servant.⁹¹ Likewise, competent and relevant evidence tending to bring the case within the operation of statutes abrogating the fellow-servant rule,⁹² or within exceptions to such statutes,⁹³ may be admitted. In an action brought under some statutory provisions, evidence tending to show that defendant's superintendent was negligent in failing to discover or correct a defect in the instrumentalities used resulting in plaintiff's injury has been held admissible.⁹⁴ In an action brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act § 1 et seq, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51 et seq, a railroad's rule intended for the safety of its employees has been held relevant on the issue of the negligence of a fellow employee.⁹⁵ Evidence having no tendency to prove that the injuries were caused by the negligence of the fellow servant,⁹⁶ or that the negligent workman was,⁹⁷ or was not,⁹⁸ a vice-principal, or to bring defendant within the terms of a statute exempting him from injuries caused by a vice-principal in certain cases,⁹⁹ is not admissible.

§ 518. — Assumption of Risk

- a. In general
- b. Notice or complaint, and promise to repair

a. In General

Any facts tending to show the plaintiff's assumption or nonassumption of risk ordinarily may be given in evidence, but such evidence is not admissible where it has no tendency to prove plaintiff's knowledge of the danger, or his assumption of risk.

On an issue of assumption of risk by plaintiff, ordinarily any facts may be given in evidence which tend to show his assumption or nonassumption of the risk,¹ as, for example, facts tending to show his knowledge or ignorance of the defect or danger.² However, such evidence is not admissible where it has no tendency to prove plaintiff's knowledge of the danger,³ or his assumption of risk.⁴

Evidence of plaintiff's knowledge or ignorance of the danger or his assumption of risk is not admissible where the injuries are caused by defects not reasonably to be regarded as incidental to the work,⁵ where it appears that the injuries were not the result of the inherent dangers of the employment,⁶ where the defects testified to are not the defects causing the injuries,⁷ where a statute requires a guard as a protection from the defect or danger,⁸ where, under a statute, assumption of risk is not a defense,⁹ or where plaintiff's offered assertion of ignorance can have no legal effect in view of the obviousness of the danger.¹⁰ Evidence that plaintiff, when injured, was unaware of the fact that he was about to do something which would surely result in injury or death is immaterial on the issue of his assumption of risk, when he had knowledge of conditions for many years prior to the injury.¹¹ Conditions existing before plaintiff entered the employment are immaterial, where there is evidence as to what the conditions were at the time he entered the employment and later at the time of the accident.¹²

In order to show nonassumption of risk, the plaintiff may show notice or complaint by himself to the employer, and a promise by the employer to remedy the defect or to remove the danger, but he may not show complaints made by someone else or those made by himself with respect to defects other than the defect causing the injury.

In order to show nonassumption of risk, plaintiff may show notice or complaint made by himself to the employer, and a promise by the employer to remedy the defect or to remove the danger,¹³ or that, after protesting because of the danger, he only worked under a threat of discharge.¹⁴ As bearing on the question whether plaintiff had a right to rely on defendant's promise to repair, other instances of complaints by plaintiff as to unsafe con-

(1) In an action brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, at least prior to the amendment of Aug 11, 1939, c 685 § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, ordinarily competent and relevant evidence as to the injured employee's assumption of risk may be admitted

(2) However, in an action brought under the act, where defendant's violation of a statute enacted for the safety of its employees contributed to plaintiff's injury, or where such injury resulted in whole, or in part, from the negligence of any officer, agent, or employee of defendant, evidence relating to plaintiff's assumption of risk is not admissible—Leet v Union Pac R Co., 142 P.2d 37, 60 Cal.App.2d 814.

ditions and their having been remedied may be shown.¹⁵

Plaintiff may not show complaints made by some one else,¹⁶ or complaints made by himself with respect to defects other than the defect causing the injury.¹⁷ Defendant may not show a custom not to make such promises to corroborate his denial of a promise to repair,¹⁸ nor may he be heard to qualify a promise given by himself by an attempted explanation inconsistent with his own testimony and that of defendant as to what he had said.¹⁹ The fact that plaintiff had never made any complaint may not be shown where there is a statute requiring a guard to be placed on the dangerous machine,²⁰ or where defendant's failure to provide a safe place for work or safe appliances did not or could not have caused or contributed to plaintiff's injury.²¹

§ 519. — Contributory Negligence

- a In general
- b Habits and reputation of injured employee
- c Employee's knowledge of defect or danger and precautions taken
- d Employee's duty to discover or remedy defect
- e Employee's obedience or disregard of rules
- f Methods of work

a. In General

In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, competent and relevant evidence as to whether or not the injured employee was contributorily negligent may be admitted.

Evidence, otherwise admissible, ordinarily may be admitted to show whether or not the injured employee was contributorily negligent.²² Under comparative negligence statutes, such as the Federal Employers' Liability Act, competent and relevant evidence tending to show whether or not the injured employee was contributorily negligent ordinarily may be admitted,²³ but not for the purpose of establishing a defense.²⁴ Evidence of contributory negligence may be excluded under a statute barring contributory negligence as a defense.²⁵

It has been held that evidence as to the exercise of due care by the injured employee,²⁶ or as to the surrounding conditions,²⁷ may be admitted. So, too, such evidence as to facts explanatory of the injured employee's conduct,²⁸ its necessity²⁹ and reasonableness,³⁰ has been held admissible. Also, competent and relevant evidence as to the dangerous condition of the place for work has been held admissible to rebut a charge of contributory negligence.³¹ Evidence may be admissible to show that the accident to the injured employee might have been caused in ways other than by the employee's negligence to rebut the defense that the balance of probabilities excludes every cause but that, without proof that any one of such ways was the cause.³²

Facts offered for the purpose of showing whether or not the injured employee was contributorily negligent must be relevant and material.³³ Where the relevancy of evidence depends on conditions not shown,³⁴ or on a similarity of conditions not proved,³⁵ or on issues not raised,³⁶ it is not admissible.

Other occurrences or acts of injured employee
Other disconnected occurrences,³⁷ or acts of plaintiff,³⁸ are not admissible to show that he was in the exercise of due care or was guilty of contributory negligence at the time of the accident, but may be admitted to show his knowledge of, or experience in, the work in which he was engaged.³⁹ Where the risk is not patently obvious to one unaccustomed thereto, evidence that others had performed the same task as the injured servant, without injury to themselves, has been held inadmissible to show contributory negligence on the part of the servant where he was injured in his first attempt to perform the task.⁴⁰

Scope of employment. On an issue of contributory negligence, evidence may be admitted to show whether or not the injured servant was acting in the line of his duty at the time of his injury.⁴¹ Thus, it has been held that competent and relevant evidence may be admitted to show what the duties of his position were,⁴² and his acts in performance of them.⁴³ However, evidence as to the duties of a position he is not employed to fill may not be admitted.⁴⁴

b. Habits and Reputation of Injured Employee

While it has been held that evidence of the habits and general reputation for care and prudence of the injured employee may be admitted for or against him, the contrary has also been held.

On the question whether or not evidence of the habits and general reputation for care and prudence of the injured employee is admissible for or against him, there is a conflict of authority, some jurisdictions holding that such evidence may be admitted,⁴⁵ others that it may not.⁴⁶ In jurisdictions allowing the evidence, its admission is based, in some of the cases expressly or impliedly, on the fact that no direct proof was obtained on the issue of due care.⁴⁷ Where the relevancy of the evidence depends on other evidence not shown, it is not admissible.⁴⁸

c. Employee's Knowledge of Defect or Danger and Precautions Taken

Evidence tending to show plaintiff's knowledge or ignorance of the defect or danger and the precautions taken by him may be admitted as bearing on the issue of his due care or lack of it at the time of the accident.

Evidence which tends to show plaintiff's knowledge or ignorance of the defect or danger may be admitted as bearing on the issue of his due care or lack of it at the time of the accident.⁴⁹ Thus, it has been held that competent and relevant evidence as to the nature of the danger,⁵⁰ conditions making knowledge difficult,⁵¹ and facts as to plaintiff's experience,⁵² mental capacity,⁵³ or physical defect affecting his ability to perceive the danger,⁵⁴ may be admitted. It has further been held permissible to show plaintiff's familiarity with the general conditions,⁵⁵ his knowledge of special conditions at the time constituting the danger,⁵⁶ as well as his knowledge of existing devices to eliminate or minimize the danger.⁵⁷ Similarly, competent and relevant evidence as to statements by plaintiff indicating his knowledge of the danger,⁵⁸ as well as statements⁵⁹ or warnings⁶⁰ of defendant and plaintiff's knowledge of the meaning of signals designed to warn him of the danger,⁶¹ may be admitted. Evidence which has no bearing on the issues is not admissible.⁶² Evidence as to the knowledge of others than plaintiff, in the absence of similarity of conditions,⁶³ or in the absence of evidence indicating that such knowledge was substantially equal to that of plaintiff,⁶⁴ or in the absence of evidence showing that such persons communicated their knowledge to plaintiff,⁶⁵ may not be admitted. So, too, evidence of a conversation as to the danger between others, in the absence of evidence that plaintiff heard it, may not be admitted.⁶⁶ Evidence as to plaintiff's knowledge⁶⁷ or ignorance⁶⁸ of the danger from certain stated defective conditions is not admissible where the danger resulted from other causes. Where the work engaged in is recognized by everyone to be dangerous, it has been held that no good purpose would be served by admitting the injured employee's application for employment made several years prior to the trial to show that he had knowledge of the danger.⁶⁹

Precautions against known dangers. Evidence as to the precautions taken by the injured employee against the dangers of a particular place,⁷⁰ or arising under certain circumstances,⁷¹ after his discovery or knowledge of them,⁷² usually may be admitted, as well as facts offered as justification for his not taking such precautions.⁷³

d. Employee's Duty to Discover or Remedy Defect

Evidence bearing on the employee's duty to discover the defect which resulted in his injury may be admitted.

Evidence, otherwise admissible, bearing on the employee's duty to discover or remedy the defect which resulted in his injury may be admitted.⁷⁴ Thus, it has been held that evidence of instructions by defendant to his employees,⁷⁵ of a practice to show the construction put on a rule requiring inspection,⁷⁶ of the probable result of an inspection by plaintiff,⁷⁷ and of plaintiff's rights after reporting a defect to his employer,⁷⁸ may be admitted. Evidence of a rule requiring an inspection by plaintiff is not admissible where it is obvious from the uncontradicted evidence that an inspection would not have disclosed the defect.⁷⁹ So, too, evidence having no bearing on plaintiff's duties,⁸⁰ or the relevancy of which depends on other evidence not shown,⁸¹ is not admissible.

e. Employee's Obedience or Disregard of Rules

In the absence of statutes providing otherwise, evidence tending to show the injured employee's obedience or disregard of his employer's rules, orders, or warnings, of which he has had notice, and which results in his injuries, may be admitted.

Ordinarily, evidence tending to show the injured employee's obedience or disregard of his employer's rules, orders, or warnings, of which he has had notice, resulting in his injuries, may be admitted.⁸² However, in actions brought under statutes such as the Federal Employers' Liability Act, where a statute enacted for the protection and safety of employees has been violated by the employer, such evidence may not be admitted,⁸³ unless such disobedience on the part of the injured employee was the sole proximate cause of the injury,⁸⁴ but, where no violation of any safety act on the part of the employer is shown, it has been held that such evidence may be admitted, under these statutes.⁸⁵

Under the general rule that competent evidence tending to show the injured employee's obedience or disregard of his employer's rules, orders, or warnings may be admitted, it has been held that evidence of facts bearing on the question whether or not such a rule existed,⁸⁶ its provisions,⁸⁷ impracticability,⁸⁸ or terms making its application discretionary with the employee⁸⁹ or contingent on circumstances,⁹⁰ may be admitted. It has also been held permissible to show the employee's knowledge and understanding of such a rule,⁹¹ the habitual disregard by the employees of the rule with the employer's knowledge and implied consent,⁹² and as bearing on the right of the employee to rely on an observance of rules.⁹³ Competent evidence as to facts relating to orders for the employee's work,⁹⁴ and their authenticity,⁹⁵ and warnings by the employer,⁹⁶ and the employee's right to rely on their completeness and sufficiency,⁹⁷ may also be admitted. Where defendant claims that the injured employee violated his instructions regarding the use of safety appliances, evidence as to the inapplicability of the instructions to the work in which the injured employee was engaged may be admitted.⁹⁸

It is not permissible to show orders not applicable to the injured employee;⁹⁹ nor is it permissible to show orders in the absence of evidence that the injured employee heard or could have heard them.¹ A rule is properly excluded where it is not shown that the injured employee violated it,² as is evidence of a violation of rules by other employees not brought to the knowledge of the master.³ A rule which merely urges employees to be careful in their work is not admissible,⁴ but it has been held that a rule requiring the utmost care in an extraordinarily dangerous part of the work is admissible.⁵

(1) In General

On an issue of contributory negligence, competent and relevant evidence may be admitted which tends to establish or negative negligence on the part of the injured employee in the method of work adopted by him.

On an issue of contributory negligence, evidence may be admitted which tends to establish or negative negligence on the part of the injured employee in the method of work adopted by him.⁶ Thus, evidence showing the possible methods available,⁷ or that no other method was available,⁸ may be admitted. So, too, evidence showing the reasonableness or propriety of the method used,⁹ the difficulty of using,¹⁰ or the impracticability¹¹ or impropriety¹² of using other methods, may be admitted.

Evidence as to the method of work used must be competent, relevant, and material to be admissible.¹³ It is not permissible to show other methods available in the absence of evidence that plaintiff knew of them,¹⁴ or to show the necessity of the method used, where such necessity on the facts in evidence is a matter of common knowledge.¹⁵ Similarly, it is not permissible to show methods used prior to the accident in the absence of evidence that they were in use at the time of the accident.¹⁶

(2) Customary Methods

Where a servant is charged with contributory negligence in the method adopted by him in doing his work, competent and relevant evidence showing his usual method of work, or the customary method of others for doing similar work, may be admitted.

Where a servant is charged with contributory negligence in the method adopted by him in doing his work, it is competent to show his usual method of work,¹⁷ and also the customary method of others for doing similar work.¹⁸ This rule has been applied in numerous cases, such as, for example, in cases involving construction work,¹⁹ mining,²⁰ railroads,²¹ shipping,²² mills and grain elevators,²³ saw and planing mills,²⁴ lumber yards,²⁵ electric companies,²⁶ foundries,²⁷ and other industries or establishments.²⁸

Evidence of customary methods is not admissible where immaterial to the issue,²⁹ or where the custom is not sufficiently proved by competent evidence,³⁰ or where the customary method of others was in itself negligent.³¹ So, too, such evidence is not admissible in the absence of evidence that plaintiff,³² or defendant,³³ knew of the custom, or that an alleged custom was being followed at the time

§ 520. Weight and Sufficiency

In an action by a servant against his master to recover for personal injuries, the plaintiff must support his cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, but the evidence may be either direct or circumstantial.

In an action by a servant against his master to recover for personal injuries, plaintiff need only establish his cause of action by a preponderance of evidence,³⁶ which may be circumstantial as well as direct.³⁷ Plaintiff must support his cause of action by evidence sufficient to prove his claim to some legal certainty,³⁸ or by evidence substantial enough to support a verdict,³⁹ and, when it appears from plaintiff's own evidence that he cannot recover in any event, the court may not ignore the facts so presented.⁴⁰ Evidence which does no more than produce speculation or conjecture as the basis for a verdict is not sufficient,⁴¹ and an inference which authorizes recovery has no probative force where it is no more reasonable than an inference from the same evidence which does not authorize recovery, and it may not be arbitrarily chosen in preference to the other,⁴² but, if plaintiff proves sufficient facts to justify a verdict for him on one theory, the existence of other rational theories favoring defendant from the same evidence does not preclude recovery by plaintiff.⁴³

In a personal injury action based on allegations of neglect of a duty owed by a master to his servant, the plaintiff must show the existence of the relation of master and servant by a preponderance of the evidence or by substantial evidence.

Plaintiff in a personal injury action based on allegations of neglect of a duty owed by a master to his servant must show by a preponderance of the evidence⁵¹ or by substantial evidence⁵² that the relation of master and servant existed between defendant and himself or the injured person, and this is also true where it becomes necessary to prove the existence of the relation between defendant and a third person.⁵³ The relation may be established not only by evidence of an express contract but also by a presentation of facts and circumstances which will authorize the conclusion that the relation of master and servant actually existed at the time of the injury.⁵⁴

In accordance with the facts and circumstances of the particular case, evidence has been held to be sufficient⁵⁵ or insufficient⁵⁶ to show that the relation

Problem of sufficiency under statutes

In action against railroad for death of employee because of the alleged negligence of the railroad, the decision of the problem of the sufficiency of evidence to show proximate cause would be the same, whether the case arose under the federal or under the state railroad liability act—McDermott v Minneapolis, N & S Ry. Co, 283 NW 116, 204 Minn 215.

Violation of statutory duty

(1) The Federal Employers' Liability Act and Federal Safety Appliance Act contemplate proof of causal relation between injury and violation of statutory duty substantially equivalent in kind and amount to proof required to establish proximate cause in negligence cases at common law—Staton v Virginian Ry Co, 195 SE 601, 119 W Va. 658

(2) Proof that railroad's violation of Federal Safety Appliance Act was proximate cause of employee's death is sufficient without proof of other negligence reasonable certainty⁶⁵ that the injury was caused by an act or omission for which the employer would be responsible; but it is not necessary that plaintiff show this with absolute certainty.⁶⁶

The causal connection need not be shown by direct evidence, but may be reasonably inferable from the circumstances of the case,⁶⁷ although in such case the evidence must be something more than merely consistent with plaintiff's theory as to how the accident occurred.⁶⁸ The inference drawn from circumstantial evidence must be a reasonable one,⁶⁹ and, where the evidence is such that the injury may as reasonably be attributed to a cause which will excuse defendant as to one which will subject it to liability, plaintiff has failed to establish his case⁷⁰ for the reason that recovery cannot be based on mere conjecture or surmise.⁷¹ On the other hand, plaintiff need not negative every other conceivable hypothesis than the one relied on,⁷² and, where the evidence justifies the inference that the accident was due to one of a number of conditions for each of which defendant is responsible, it is sufficient to warrant a recovery.⁷³

If there is sufficient evidence that the alleged negligence caused the injury, a showing that there was another contributing cause does not exonerate de-

Inference from absence of employee's negligence

No inference of the employer's negligence arises from absence of a fair inference that employee was himself negligent.—Alabama Great Southern R Co v Davis, 18 So 2d 737, 246 Ala. 64, certiorari denied 65 S Ct 676, 324 U.S 846, 89 L Ed. 1407.

the master's negligence beyond a reasonable doubt⁹⁷ Proof may be made by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence⁹⁸ Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act proof that the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury was the negligence of the employer is sufficient to warrant recovery⁹⁹

Violation of statute. Proof of the violation by the master of a statutory or valid municipal regulation is evidence of negligence on the part of the master, which may be sufficient to establish his liability to the servant,¹ at least where such violation may not be excused by a showing that under the special circumstances the failure to observe the statute or ordinance was justifiable² In any event it must appear that the violation was the proximate cause of the injury.³

b. Knowledge by Master of Defect or Danger

As a general rule, in order to show the master's negligence, the plaintiff must make an affirmative showing of actual knowledge on his part of the defect or danger or else prove facts which show that, in the exercise of ordinary care, he should have known it.

As a general rule, in order to show the master's negligence, plaintiff must make an affirmative showing of actual knowledge on his part of the defect or danger or else prove facts which show that, in the exercise of ordinary care, he should have known it⁵ Thus proof of the existence of a dangerous condition without a showing that it existed for a sufficient length of time to afford defendant opportunity to discover it is insufficient to charge him with liability therefor,⁶ and if it appears that the defect was latent and not discoverable on ordinary inspection⁷ or that no duty rested on defendant to make such inspection⁸ recovery may not be had.

Circumstantial evidence may be sufficient to show negligence of the master in failing to discover the defect or danger,⁹ and plaintiff may prove the actual¹⁰ or constructive¹¹ knowledge on the part of defendant by proof of facts from which such knowledge may reasonably be inferred, as, for example, that the master was informed of the dangerous condition,¹² that a similar condition had manifested itself before,¹³ or that the danger or defect was discoverable on a due inspection and that such inspection was not made.¹⁴ However, the fact that an inspection was made is not conclusive evidence of the absence of negligence on the part of the master.¹⁵

In accordance with the facts and circumstances of the particular case, the evidence has been held to show that the master had actual or constructive

notice of the defect or danger¹⁶ or that the defect or danger could have been discovered or anticipated in the exercise of due care.¹⁷ In like manner the evidence has been held insufficient to show that the master knew or ought to have known of the defect or danger,¹⁸ that the defect or danger could have been discovered or anticipated in the exercise of due care,¹⁹ or that the master was guilty of negligence by a failure to make a proper inspection.²⁰

c. Appliances or Places of Work

As a general rule in order for the servant to recover for an injury allegedly caused by the failure of the master to furnish safe appliances or a safe place to work, the plaintiff must adduce substantial evidence of the alleged defect or danger in the condition of the appliances or place of work and of the negligence of the master in connection therewith to create a preponderance in his favor.

Vicious propensity of bull

In employee's action against employer for injuries sustained when gored by employer's bull, evidence of vicious propensity of bull was required to be unequivocal, a propensity being vicious if it tends to harm, whether manifested in play or in anger, or in some outbreak of untrained nature—Hill v Moseley, 17 S.E.2d 676, 220 N.C. 485

Changes made by master after accident

In action for death of a conductor, when he lost his balance while alighting from a moving engine as it reached the station platform, evidence that after the accident the depth of the trench formed by platform and rail was lessened and the rail was raised, justified an inference by the jury that the platform did not, at the time of the accident, conform to the standard type of curb platforms, as bearing on the issue of defendant's negligence in maintaining it—Southern Pac Co v Huyck, 128 P.2d 849, 61 Nev. 365

Changes made by master before accident

Where, in an action for the death of a servant by the involuntary operation of a lever connected with a locomotive frame slot cutting machine, defendant introduced evidence that after prior similar accidents it had substituted a wheel for the lever, which was claimed to be safer, such evidence could not be ignored as bearing on the question of negligence in a subsequent change back to the lever—Deninger v American Locomotive Co, Pa., 185 F. 22, 107 C. C.A. 126

Defect in coupler

Alleged fact that at time of accident resulting in death of railroad switchman couplers were in such condition that they would not couple automatically on impact as required by federal statutes could be proved by circumstantial evidence—Chicago, St. P. M & O Ry. Co v Muldowney, CCA Minn., 130 F.2d 971, certiorari denied 63 S.Ct. 536, 317 U.S. 700, 87 L.Ed. 560

(2) Condition of step of engine at time of trial was held no evidence of condition at time of accident nine months previous—Seaboard Air Line Ry Co v De Loatch, 141 S.E. 121, 149 Va. 338.

Appearance after accident

In laborer's suit against master for injuries sustained in pushing wheelbarrow, testimony that after accident wheelbarrow appeared "pretty shakley" and that wire had been substituted for missing bolts to hold frame together authorized inference that defects in wheelbarrow existed before accident—McBachin & McBachin Const Co v. Burks, 75 S.W.2d 784, 189 Ark. 947

Rusted and corroded bolts

In an action for death of a locomotive fireman, due to a boiler explosion, testimony that the broken ends of a large number of stay bolts were rusted and corroded, indicating that they were broken some time before the explosion, was held to be evidence tending to prove negligence—Findley v Coal & Coke Ry. Co, 73 S.E. 396, 72 W.Va. 268.

quirement to furnish a safe appliance or place of work is involved, mere proof of the existence of a defect in the appliance or place of work or the happening of the accident or injury at the place the servant was required or permitted to be in performing the duties of his employment is not, without more, sufficient to establish the master's negligence;²⁸ but under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur the very nature of the accident, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, may in itself be sufficient to warrant the inference that the injury was occasioned by the master's negligence.²⁹ Evidence of the failure of the master to provide a reasonably safe instrumentality with which to work or place wherein to work makes out a prima facie case of negligence,³⁰ particularly where a statute expressly so provides,³¹ but ordinarily, where the evidence shows that the selection or construction of an appliance, or the creation of a safe place to work, was a detail of the work left to the employees, the master will not be held liable for an improper selection or construction of an appliance³² or for the danger arising in the progress of the work.³³ Failure of the master to furnish the newest type of appliance is not evidence of negligence if the appliance furnished is reasonably safe.³⁴

In chauffeur's action for injuries sustained when he fell on floor of dining room in employer's home, proof that wax one quarter of an inch thick was applied to floor and was not dry at time of the accident established prima facie case for chauffeur on ground of employer's negligence.—*Ecker v. Retroactive operation of statute

A statute providing that the proof of injury from the running of engines or cars shall be prima facie evidence of the want of reasonable skill and care has been held to provide only a rule of evidence, and not to deal with substantive rights and to be applicable in the trial of all cases after its enactment, even though the injury occurred before.—*Myers v. Acceptance of duty to construct

(1) Where employer seeks to avoid liability to employee for injury on ground that employee accepted delegation of duty to construct safety appliance, acceptance of duty by employee should be proved by express agreement.—E. L. Bruce Co. v. Brogan, 166 So. 350, 175 Miss. 208.

(2) In action for injury sustained by employee when kicked by employer's mule which employee was shoeing, the fact that employee was offered enough lumber to build special stall for mule was held insufficient to show that employee accepted delegation of duty to construct stall.—*E. Miner engaged in making place safe

Rule which requires master to furnish servant with reasonably safe place to work was held not to apply where evidence disclosed that miner was injured by falling slate when engaged in blasting and removing dangerous slate overhanging place of work in order that place might be made safe, since miner was engaged in making dangerous place safe and created danger in progress of his work.—*Baker v. pertaining to appliances or places of work which has been enacted for the safety of employees may be sufficient to establish liability of the master to the servant without other proof of negligence.³⁵ Under such statutes evidence of the failure of an appliance to function has been held sufficient proof of its defective character and of the violation of the statute by the master,³⁶ regardless of how it functioned before or after such failure,³⁷ and the particular defect which caused the injury need not be pointed out.³⁸ The evidence must show that the statute on which liability is sought to be predicated was actually violated,³⁹ and, where the accident is due to a defective appliance which is not covered by the statute, the same rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence apply as in a common-law action for negligence.⁴⁰

Coupler

(1) Generally a violation of Federal Safety Appliance Act provisions prohibiting a common carrier from using or hauling any car used in moving interstate traffic not equipped with couplers coupling automatically by impact and which can be uncoupled without the necessity of men going between ends of cars is shown by proof that cars on a fair trial failed to couple automatically by impact

(3) While Federal Safety Appliance Act does not require carrier to use only cars which will remain coupled until uncoupling device is operated, proof that cars became uncoupled while in use, without human intervention, is evidence from which jury may infer that coupler was not in condition to perform function required of it by statute—Vigor v. Chesapeake & O Ry Co., CCA Ind., 101 F 2d 865, certiorari denied Chesapeake & O R Co v Vigor, 59 S Ct 1031, 307 US 635, 83 L Ed 1517

Use of customary appliance. Proof that an appliance is one customarily used for the purpose, while not conclusive,⁴¹ tends to show due care on the part of the master in furnishing it,⁴² but the use of a customary appliance does not tend to show due care where the evidence shows that it was used for a new function.⁴³ Evidence of the failure of other employers in the same industry to furnish protective appliances does not establish that defendant was free from negligence in not furnishing them;⁴⁴ but, on the other hand, the failure of the master to furnish a device in customary use for the protection of his servant is some evidence of the master's negligence.⁴⁵ A master may show due care by proof that he has used the same appliance or similar appliances or materials for a length of time without accident,⁴⁶ but this does not constitute conclusive evidence that the appliances or materials are reasonably safe.⁴⁷

Evidence held sufficient to show negligence. In accordance with the facts and circumstances of the particular case, the evidence has been held to be sufficient to show negligence of the master in furnishing defective appliances⁴⁸ or in providing an unsafe place for the servant to perform his work.⁴⁹ More specifically, the evidence has been held to be sufficient to show negligence of the master in failing to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe entitle plaintiff to recover for the alleged failure of the master to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe tool or instrument for the performance of his work,⁹⁵ in failing to furnish reasonably safe machinery,⁹⁶ in failing to furnish a reasonably safe electrical appliance or apparatus,⁹⁷ or in failing to furnish a reasonably safe platform,⁹⁸ scaffold,⁹⁹ ladder,¹ stairway,² gangway,³ or other support.⁴ Also the evidence has been held insufficient to show negligence of the master in the construction or maintenance of an unsafe derrick, elevator, or other hoisting device.⁵

In like manner, evidence has been held insufficient to show negligence of a railroad in an action by a servant of the railroad for injury alleged to be due to the unsafe condition of a locomotive⁶ or of a railroad car,⁷ such as where the negligence alleged was failure to furnish a suitable coupler,⁸

Scope of employment or authority

(1) Evidence was held to authorize finding that railroad shop foreman, giving directions to mechanic's helper to wash helper's overalls and providing cleansing material, was acting within scope of his employment, with respect to railroad's liability for injury to helper's eyes from cleansing compound—Watkins v New York, N H & H R Co, 195 NE 888, 290 Mass 448.

(2) Evidence of an order by a foreman, directing a lineman to paint a telephone pole carrying heavily charged electric wires, with the assurance that they were dead, was held to warrant a finding that it was within the scope of the foreman's authority—Whalen v. New England Telephone & Telegraph Co., 117 NE 620, 238 Mass 361.

Statement equivalent to order

as to whether a master has provided a reasonably safe method for doing the work, evidence of the customary use of the same method by other persons engaged in the same business is of some weight to show reasonable care³⁷ but it is not conclusive³⁸ On the other hand, failure of the master to employ the customary methods of doing the work or to take the customary precautions is some evidence of the master's negligence³⁹

Cases in which the evidence was held sufficient or insufficient to show negligence are separately grouped in the footnotes where the negligence charged was in the operation of a railroad train or car,⁴⁰ as, for example, driving at excessive or moving⁴⁸ or striking⁴⁹ of the car or locomotive at which plaintiff was engaged in work.

e. Employment of Incompetent or Vicious Servant

Negligence of the master may be sufficiently established where the servant adduces substantial evidence of the master's absence of due care in the employment or retention of an incompetent, reckless, or vicious servant.

Negligence of the master may be sufficiently established where the servant adduces substantial evidence, either direct or circumstantial, of the master's absence of due care in the employment or retention of an incompetent, reckless, or vicious servant⁵⁰. In order to establish such negligence it is essential that plaintiff show by a preponderance of evidence the fact of the servant's incompetency or vicious temperament⁵¹ and that the master knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known of it.⁵² Proof alone of the happening of the accident or of a single previous act of negligence or viciousness on the part of the servant is not sufficient to show that he was generally incompetent or vicious,⁵³ but, where the previous act or omission was of an especially flagrant character, slight evidence aliunde may be sufficient to warrant the inference of such incompetency or viciousness⁵⁴ and of the master's constructive knowledge thereof.⁵⁵

Causal connection In order to entitle a servant to recover on the ground that his injuries resulted from the negligence of an incompetent fellow servant for whose employment or retention in the service defendant was chargeable with negligence, it must be definitely shown that it was in fact the negligence of such person which caused the injury.⁵⁶

f. Insufficiency of Force for Work

Where recovery is sought by a servant on the theory that his injury was caused by the master's negligence in failing to employ a sufficient number of men to perform the work safely, the plaintiff must adduce enough evidence to show that the force was actually insufficient and that the master failed to exercise due care in this respect.

g. Failure to Instruct or Warn Servant

Negligence of the master may be sufficiently established where the servant adduces substantial evidence which shows that the master was guilty of a failure to warn or instruct the servant as to a danger actually or constructively known to the master, but of which the servant was unaware.

The master's failure adequately to instruct or warn the servant may be proved by either direct or circumstantial evidence,⁵⁹ and negligence of the master may be sufficiently established where the servant adduces substantial evidence which shows that the master was guilty of a failure to warn or instruct the servant as to a danger actually or constructively known to the master, but of which the servant was unaware,⁶⁰ or at any rate unappreciative, whether his ignorance or lack of appreciation may have been due to his youth or inexperience⁶¹ or to a physical or mental deficiency.⁶² On the other hand, where the evidence shows that the danger was known to the servant,⁶³ or was obvious,⁶⁴ or was one that could not reasonably have been apprehended by the master,⁶⁵ plaintiff has failed to establish negligence of the master in failing to warn or instruct the servant.

ing signal where he had reason to believe that the servant was in a position of imminent peril may be sufficient to establish negligence which will subject the master to liability for ensuing injuries to the servant.⁶⁶ The cases are separately grouped in the footnotes in which the negligence charged was the failure to give the customary warning as to the movements of trains or cars in the conduct of railroad operations,⁶⁷ as, for example, omitting to give the usual starting⁶⁸ or stopping⁶⁹ signal; failing to signal the presence of a stalled train or car obstructing the track,⁷⁰ failing to give warning of the approach of a train or car;⁷¹ or failing to give notice of the intention to conduct kicking or switching operations over the servant's place of work.⁷²

cumstances of the particular case⁷⁵ Evidence that plaintiff worked under the same roof with the person who caused the injury and was paid by the same employer is not conclusive as a showing that they were fellow servants.⁷⁶ In accordance with the facts and circumstances of the particular case, evidence has been held to be sufficient⁷⁷ or not sufficient⁷⁸ to show that the person whose act caused or contributed to the injury was a vice principal or superior servant.

Where an employee is injured by the act of another employee, proof that the other employee was acting within the scope of his employment is essential to establish the employer's liability under the doctrine of respondeat superior.⁷⁹

b. Fact of Negligence

Evidence of the fellow servant's negligence must be substantial, but circumstantial evidence may be sufficient.

In order to establish the negligence of a fellow servant as the proximate cause of the injury, plaintiff must show that the act was not that of a person of ordinary prudence under the circumstances⁸⁰ Evidence of the fellow servant's negligence must be substantial,⁸¹ and the matter must not be left to conjecture,⁸² but circumstantial evidence may be sufficient.⁸³ In accordance with the facts and circumstances of the particular case, evidence has been held to be sufficient⁸⁴ or in particular

Where the master interposes a plea of contributory negligence on the part of the servant, he must show such contributory negligence by a preponderance of the evidence, either direct or circumstantial.

show such contributory negligence by a preponderance of the evidence,¹³ but he need not prove it beyond every theoretical possibility¹⁴ Contributory negligence,¹⁵ or its antithesis, due care,¹⁶ may be proved by circumstantial evidence. The fact that the servant failed to take every possible precaution does not conclusively establish his negligence if he has acted as the average person would have acted under the circumstances,¹⁷ and the fact that the evidence shows that plaintiff placed himself in a dangerous position because of an emergency created by the negligence of the master does not relieve the master from liability¹⁸ Evidence that the employee performed the work in the manner directed may eliminate the contention that the work was performed in a negligent manner so as to preclude recovery,¹⁹ at least where the evidence does not show that the danger in obeying the directions of the master was so absolute and imminent that injury would almost necessarily result²⁰ So, where the evidence shows compliance with the directions of the master on his assurance of safety, it may be sufficient to warrant recovery against the master.²¹

Where the doctrine of last clear chance is sought to be applied to impose liability on the master after negligence of the servant has been shown, the evidence must show that the master or his agent had an opportunity to avoid the accident.²²

In particular cases the evidence has been held

Rules and orders of railroad

(1) In order to sustain plea of railway employee's violation of order, prohibiting line-up in operating motorcar, but enjoining use of rule book, providing for written line-up when possible, evidence must show violation of both order and rule—Southern Ry. Co. v. Smith, 137 So. 398, 223 Ala. 533.

(2) Evidence that brakemen while employed in switching operation rode on side of freight cars all the time in violation of railroad rule authorized finding that railroad had knowledge of such practice and did not insist on strict compliance with rule, hence brakeman who was crushed against box car while riding one side of combination passenger car was not barred from recovering for injuries sustained on ground he had vio-

the servant, according to the judicial decisions in the course of mining or excavating operations on the subject in various states, was injured tions³⁴

§ 528. Conduct of Trial

The general rules governing the conduct of trials in civil actions apply in personal injury actions by a servant against his master.

The general rules governing the conduct of trials in civil actions, discussed in the C.J.S. title Trial §§ 36-156, also 64 C.J. p 65 note 20-p 232 note 84, are applicable to an action by a servant against his master for personal injuries.¹ Thus it is improper for plaintiff's counsel to place before the jury the fact that the master carries indemnity insurance.²

§ 529. Questions of Law and Fact

a. In general

b. Effect of law requiring submission of issues

c. Actions under Federal Employers' Liability Act

a. In General

In an action by a servant for personal injuries all questions of fact or mixed questions of law and fact are for the jury, under proper instructions from the court, while questions of law are for the court.

As in other cases, in an action by a servant for personal injuries all questions of fact or mixed questions of law and fact are for the jury, under proper instructions from the court,³ while questions of law are for the court.⁴ The case should be submitted to the jury where the evidence tends to support the allegations of the complaint⁵ or makes out a prima facie case;⁶ and where there is sufficient evidence to support a verdict for plaintiff it is error to direct a verdict for defendant,⁷ sustain a demurrer to the evidence,⁸ or grant a nonsuit.⁹ So, where the evidence on a material fact is conflicting,¹⁰ or involves a question of credibility,¹¹ or is such that fair-minded men may reasonably draw different inferences or conclusions therefrom,¹² a jury question is presented. Conversely, where the evidence is not in conflict,¹³ and is such that fair-minded men in the exercise of reason and judgment can reach only one conclusion,¹⁴ or is insufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff,¹⁵ a question of law for the court is presented, and the court should determine the proceeding by nonsuit, directed verdict, or otherwise, in accordance with the local practice.

Right to maintain action. Whether plaintiff has a sufficient interest in the subject matter to maintain the action¹⁶ or whether the conditions precedent to the bringing of the action have been complied with¹⁷ are questions for the jury where there is a conflict of evidence.

Whether the right to recover is governed by statute or the principles of the common law ordinarily is a question for the court.¹⁸ It is also a question for the court whether in a particular case a statute is applicable,¹⁹ unless the applicability of the statute depends on the determination of a question of fact.²⁰

Dangerous work. Ordinarily, whether the work in which an employee is engaged involves risk or danger within the meaning of a statute governing such work is a question of fact for the jury,²¹ but where the facts are such that reasonable men can reach but one conclusion the question then becomes one of law for the court to determine.²²

b. Effect of Law Requiring Submission of Issues

Constitutional and statutory provisions requiring certain questions to be submitted to the jury have been held not to require that in every case the evidence must go to the jury, regardless of its legal effect.

Sometimes by express constitutional and statutory provisions the questions of the employer's negligence, and the assumption of risk by the servant, and his contributory negligence, as discussed infra §§ 534, 536, 537, are required to be submitted to the jury, but it has been held that such provisions do not require that in every case the evidence must go to the jury, regardless of its legal effect,²³ and under provisions of this nature no jury question arises in the absence of evidence tending to raise the different issues, it being a question for the court whether the issues are raised.²⁴

c. Actions under Federal Employers' Liability Act

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act the credibility of witnesses, the weight of evidence, and the inferences to be drawn from the facts are questions of fact for the jury; but submission to the jury of contested issues of fact is not required if there is only a scintilla of evidence or where the evidence is such that there can be but one reasonable conclusion as to the verdict or finding.

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act the credibility of witnesses,²⁵ the weight and probative value of evidence,²⁶ and the inferences to be drawn from uncontroverted as well as controverted facts²⁷ are questions of fact. If there is any substantial evidence to support the cause of action pleaded, it must be submitted to the jury,²⁸ and it is not the function of the court to search the record for conflicting circumstantial evidence in order to take the case away from the jury on a theory that the proof gives equal support to inconsistent and uncertain inferences.²⁹ A jury question is not necessarily presented, however, in every case under the act.³⁰ Submission of contested issues of fact is not required if there is only a scintilla of evidence;³¹ and the court should determine the proceeding by nonsuit, directed verdict, or otherwise, in accordance with the local practice, without submission to the jury where the evidence is such that, without weighing the credibility of witnesses,³² there can be but one reasonable conclusion as to the verdict or finding,³³ or where the evidence and all the inferences which the jury could justifiably draw therefrom would be insufficient to support a verdict or finding for the other party.³⁴

§ 530. — Relation of Parties

Where evidence as to the existence of the relation of master and servant at the time of the injury is conflicting or is reasonably susceptible of more than one inference, the question ordinarily should be submitted to the jury.

a. In General

Ordinarily the question as to the nature and cause of the injury suffered by an employee is one of fact for the jury, but where the evidence is not conflicting and is not such that reasonable minds can differ as to its verity and inference the question should not be submitted to the jury.

cause of the injury may reasonably be inferred,⁶⁷ is sufficient to warrant or require submission of the question to the jury. Evidence which is otherwise sufficient to warrant or require submission of the question to the jury will not be withdrawn from the jury merely because it is contradicted or otherwise weakened or impaired by other evidence in the case.⁶⁸

Time and place of injury Where there is any evidence on the subject, questions as to the time⁶⁹ and place⁷⁰ of the injury are for the jury to determine.

b. Matters of Conjecture

Where the cause of the injury is left by the evidence to mere conjecture the case should not be submitted to the jury, but where the evidence is sufficient to warrant a reasonable inference that the injury resulted from an act for which the master is liable the question should be submitted to the jury.

Where the cause of the injury is left by the evidence to mere conjecture⁷¹ or is shown as a mere possibility or probability⁷² the case should not be submitted to the jury. This does not mean, however, that a case should not be submitted to the jury because the cause of the injury is not shown by direct evidence but rests on inference from evidence of the surrounding circumstances,⁷³ and it has frequently been held that, where the evidence is sufficient to warrant a reasonable inference, that is, not a matter of conjecture merely, that the injury resulted from an act for which the master is liable, the question should be submitted to the jury although it might be found that the injury was caused in other ways.⁷⁴ Where it is no more inferable from the evidence that the injury was caused by some act for which the employer is liable than that it arose from some cause for which the employer is not liable, it has been held that the case should not be submitted to the jury.⁷⁵ Where, however, the inference arises that the negligence was caused by one of several causes, each of which would make the employer liable,⁷⁶ or where the injuries are attributable to several defects which have sprung from the same negligence and have combined and co-operated in the production of a dangerous condition that becomes the proximate cause of the injury,⁷⁷ the case should not be taken from the jury.

c. Happening of Accident

Ordinarily, where there is no evidence beyond the mere existence of the defect or the happening of the accident or injury, the case should not be submitted to the jury; but, where the thing which caused the injury is shown to be under the control of the defendant and the accident is such as usually does not happen if those in control use proper care, the question as to the cause of the accident becomes one for the jury.

Ordinarily, where there is no evidence beyond the mere existence of the defect or the happening of the accident or injury, the case should not be submitted to the jury.⁷⁸ As a general rule, however, even as between master and servant, where the thing which caused the injury is shown to be under the management or control of defendant or its servants, other than the one injured, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management or control use proper care, the happening of the accident gives rise to a presumption that it occurred because of the master's failure to use proper care, discussed supra § 501, and in such case the question as to the cause of the accident becomes one for the jury to determine.⁷⁹

unless it is shown⁸⁰ without dispute⁸¹ that the injury was due to a cause not chargeable to the master's failure to use proper care. So, where in addition to the evidence furnished by the presumption there is other evidence pointing toward the master's failure to use proper care,⁸² even though such additional proof may be slight,⁸³ a jury question is presented.

d. Accidental or Improbable Injury

Whether an employee's injury was the result of a mere accident or could have been reasonably anticipated by the master ordinarily is a question for the jury unless there is no evidence as to the cause of the accident or showing that a man of ordinary care would have foreseen the danger.

Whether the injury to an employee was the result of a mere accident or could have been reasonably anticipated by the master ordinarily is a question for the jury⁸⁴ unless there is no evidence as to the cause of the accident⁸⁵ or there is no evidence showing that the accident proximately resulted from any act for which the master is liable⁸⁶ or that a man of ordinary care would have foreseen the danger.⁸⁷ Whether or not an injury is an accident, once the facts have been ascertained, is a question of law.⁸⁸ On a contention that it is improbable or impossible that the injury to a servant was caused in the manner claimed the case should not be withdrawn from the jury⁸⁹ unless the facts clearly disclose that the injury could not have occurred in the manner claimed.⁹⁰

(1) In General

Whether an injury to an employee proximately resulted from the employer's failure to perform the duty resting on him to furnish safe and suitable appliances and places for work ordinarily is a question for the jury unless the evidence does not tend to show that the injuries sustained by the employee were the proximate result of the employer's breach of duty.

As in other cases, the question of the proximate cause of the injuries to a servant working in a mine, excavation, quarry, or the like ordinarily is one for the jury to determine⁹⁷ unless there is no evidence tending to establish the proximate cause of the injury⁹⁸

Under the Illinois Mines and Miners' Act, imposing liability on a mine owner for injuries resulting from a willful violation of the provisions of the act, the question whether the violation of the act was the proximate cause of the injury is usually one of fact for the jury⁹⁹. Where, however, the proof is such that all reasonable minds must agree that the violation of the statute had nothing to do with the injury complained of, the question of prox-

f. Methods of Work, Rules, and Orders

Where there is any substantial evidence tending to show that negligence on the part of the master with respect to methods of work, rules, or orders was the proximate cause of injuries received by the servant, the case should be submitted to the jury.

Where there is any substantial evidence tending to show that the negligence on the part of the master, or of those for whose acts he is responsible, with respect to the methods of work, rules, or orders, was the proximate cause of injuries received by the servant, then the case becomes one for determination by the jury.² This rule is frequently applied in actions by railroad employees.³ Where,

ing a task with insufficient help and of suffering or ailments immediately or shortly thereafter.⁸ Where, however, there is no evidence of the causal connection between the injury and the master's failure to furnish sufficient help, the question is one of law for the court to determine.⁹

1. Concurrent Negligence of Employer and Third Person

Whether a servant's injuries were caused by the concurrent negligence of his employer and a third person is a jury question where there is evidence of the causal relation.

On a contention that the injuries to a servant were caused by the concurrent negligence of his employer and a third person, whether they were so caused is a question for the jury where there is any evidence tending to show the causal connection.¹⁰ So it is a question for the jury whether the injuries were the proximate result alone of the employer's negligence¹¹ or that of the third person.¹² Where, however, the evidence does not tend to show that the injuries resulted from the negligence of the employer¹³ or of the third person,¹⁴ then the question should not be submitted to the jury.

a. In General

The question of the master's negligence is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury or is one for the court where the case is tried without a jury; but whether or not there is any evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the master is a question for the court, and the case should not be submitted to the jury where the evidence does not tend to sustain the negligence alleged or where only one inference can reasonably be drawn from the evidence.

law.²¹ The question of the employer's liability should not be submitted to the jury where the only evidence of negligence is as to admissions made by him with respect to his negligence,²² and donations and promises of future assistance by him.²³

The question of willful and wanton negligence is one for the jury where the evidence tends to show it.²⁴

b. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

Where constitutional or statutory provisions expressly provide for the submission to the jury of the question of the employer's negligence, the question must be submitted if there is any competent evidence of negligence; and in an action brought under an employers' liability act or other statute relating to the safety of employees, the question of the employer's negligence is ordinarily one for the jury.

tending to show the negligence of the master,²⁵ but, in the absence of such evidence, the court may direct a verdict.²⁶ In an action brought under one of the various employers' liability acts or other statutes relating to the safety of employees, to recover for injuries to a servant, the question of the employer's negligence is ordinarily one for the jury,²⁷ as is the question whether the employment was a dangerous one within the terms of the statute.²⁸ Whether there is any evidence of the master's negligence is a question for the court,²⁹ and, where the evidence shows the applicability of a factory act, that question should not be submitted to the jury.³⁰

Where there is a conflict in the evidence, an employer is entitled to have the question of his negligence submitted to the jury notwithstanding a statutory presumption arising from the injury.³¹ In order to warrant submission of the issue of negligence under the Federal Employer's Liability Act, there

Authority of court restricted

In actions under Federal Employers' Liability Act, authority of trial courts, by direction of a verdict, to withdraw from consideration of jury matter bearing on question of defendant's negligence is very restricted—Keith v. Wheeling & L. E. Ry. Co., C.C.A. Ohio, 160 F.2d 654.

Restatement of prior law

Provision of state employers' liability act that all questions of negligence shall be question of fact for jury is a restatement of the law in relation to trials by jury as it existed prior to the enactment of the act—Lang v. U. S. Reduction Co., C.C.A. Ind., 110 F.2d 441 must be some substantial proof of negligence,³² and a verdict may properly be directed for defendant if plaintiff fails to present such evidence³³ or to make out a prima facie case,³⁴ and a mere scintilla of evidence,³⁵ or evidence leaving the matter in the realm of speculation and conjecture,³⁶ is insufficient to take the case to the jury on the question of defendant's negligence. The question whether the violation by a master of a city ordinance enacted for protection of persons and property from injury may be such proof of negligence as will support an action by an injured servant against the master is for the jury.³⁷ Under a statute providing that a motion to direct a verdict shall be denied where the adverse party objects thereto, the court cannot hold that the employer was negligent as a matter of law, but the issue must be submitted to the jury.³⁸

c. Care of Inexperienced or Youthful Servant

Negligence of the master with respect to the protection of inexperienced or youthful servants against injury or in employing a minor servant in violation of statute is a question for the jury, unless the facts are not in dispute.

The question whether or not defendant has exercised due care to protect an inexperienced or youthful servant against injury is one of fact for the jury,³⁹ unless there is no evidence on which to base a verdict.⁴⁰

The negligence of a master in employing a minor servant in violation of the terms of a statute is ordinarily a question for the jury;⁴¹ but, where the facts are not in dispute, the question is one for the courts.⁴²

d. Medical Attention

Negligence of the employer in securing or failing to secure medical attention for an injured servant, and negligence of a doctor furnished by the employer, are questions for the jury where the evidence tends to show negligence of the master.

The question whether an employer was negligent in securing medical attention for an injured servant,⁴³ or whether the master failed to employ a competent physician,⁴⁴ is a question for the jury where the evidence tends to show negligence of the master in regard thereto. tending a particular servant, depends largely on the surrounding circumstances,⁴⁵ and the question to be left to the jury is whether the physician acted in good faith in forming his judgment.⁴⁶

e. Customary Methods and Appliances

It is for the jury to determine disputed questions of fact as to customary methods and appliances and as to whether an employer was negligent in failing to adopt customary methods and appliances, but, where the only inference that can reasonably be drawn from the evidence is that the master conformed to the general usage among prudent employers, he may be declared as a matter of law to have been in the exercise of due care.

The question whether an appliance or method of construction is in general or customary use is a question of fact,⁴⁷ and the same is true as to the question whether a usage exists, and if so, what such usage is.⁴⁸ Evidence that an employer has used customary methods and appliances, as discussed supra § 524, is not conclusive of the question as to his freedom from negligence, but such evidence goes to the jury with other evidence for determination of the ultimate fact whether the particular appliance or method was reasonably safe.⁴⁹ It is likewise a question for the jury whether an employer is negligent in failing to adopt customary methods and appliances,⁵⁰ and he will not be held negligent as a matter of law for failing to do so.⁵¹ On evidence showing that the employer was negligent in failing to furnish certain devices for the use of his employees, the case should not be withheld from the jury by reason of the fact that there is no evidence that such devices were customary or demanded by good practice.⁵² Where the only inference that can reasonably be drawn from the evidence is that the master conformed to the general usage among prudent and skillful employers in well regulated concerns in respect of the adoption or use of an appliance, he may be declared, as a matter of law, to have been in the exercise of due care.⁵³

(1) General Rule

Negligence on the part of the master with respect to his tools, machinery, appliances, or places for work is a question of fact for the jury, unless there is no evidence tending to show the master's negligence, or unless the evidence adduced is conclusive one way or the other.

Where, in an action by a servant to recover for personal injuries, there is evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the master with respect to his tools, machinery, appliances, or places for work, the question as to his negligence should be submitted to the jury,⁵⁴ but, where there is no evidence tending to show the master's negligence in this respect, or where the evidence which has been adduced on the question of his default is conclusive one way or the other, the question should not be submitted to the jury, and it is for the court to determine whether there is any evidence which has a tendency to show negligence, or whether the evidence conclusively shows it, or its absence⁵⁵

(2) Ways and Places for Work

The question whether an employer has been negligent in respect of furnishing a reasonably safe place for work is a question for the jury where the issue is raised by the evidence; but the question should not be submitted to the jury where the evidence does not tend to show a lack of proper care by the employer or where the evidence is such that it permits of only one conclusion.

The question whether an employer has been negligent in respect of furnishing a reasonably safe place for work is a question for the jury where the issue is raised by the evidence⁵⁶ So, where the evidence is sufficient to raise the issue, it is for the

(4) Instrumentalities Belonging to, or Provided by, Third Persons

Where an employer could have discovered, by use of ordinary care, the dangerous condition of an instrumentality not belonging to him, but by which his servant was injured in the performance of his duties, the question of the employer's negligence is for the jury.

Where an employer is in a position to have discovered, by the use of ordinary care, the dangerous condition of an instrumentality not belonging to him but by which his servant was injured in the performance of his duties, the question of the employer's negligence is for the jury,⁷⁶ but not where it does not appear that there was any defect known to him or in existence under such circumstances as to imply that he was negligent in not knowing it.⁷⁷ It has been held that the purchase of an appliance from a reputable manufacturer does not establish the exercise of ordinary care by the master as a matter of law, and, where defects are discoverable by the exercise of ordinary care, the question of negligence is for the jury.⁷⁸ Whether or not an article was made by a reputable dealer is a question for the jury.⁷⁹

In an action for injuries to a servant resulting from defective or dangerous machinery, the question of the master's negligence is one for the jury unless there is no evidence tending to show any negligence or unless only one conclusion is deducible from the facts.

In an action for injuries to a servant resulting from defective or dangerous machinery, the question of the master's negligence is generally one for the jury.⁸⁰ Thus the master's negligence is a question for the jury where he fails to provide or maintain

proper safety devices,⁸¹ such as belt shifters,⁸² or operates machinery without safety devices with which it has been equipped,⁸³ or maintains revolving projecting bolts,⁸⁴ or set screws in such position that they are dangerous to the servant,⁸⁵ or furnishes a defective or dangerous belt,⁸⁶ or maintains unsafe conditions around dangerous machinery.⁸⁷

Where, however, in an action for injuries from the operation of machinery there is no evidence tending to show any negligence on the part of the master, the question of negligence should not be submitted to the jury since it is one of law,⁸⁸ it is also a question of law where only one conclusion is deducible from the facts.⁸⁹

Where the servant is injured by the automatic starting of machinery when it should have remained at rest, the question of the master's negligence is ordinarily one for the jury,⁹⁰ although it has been held that evidence of the mere starting of a machine where it had not occurred before,⁹¹ or in the absence of any other evidence of negligence,⁹² is insufficient to raise a jury question as to the negligence of the master.

(b) Horses and Vehicles

Where there is some evidence of negligence on the part of the master, the question of his negligence is ordinarily one for the jury where a servant's injuries result from the acts of horses or mules furnished by the master or are caused by a defective and dangerous condition of a wagon or other vehicle.

The question of the master's negligence is one for the jury where a servant's injuries result from the acts of horses or mules furnished by the master, and the evidence tends to show that the animals had vicious propensities,⁹³ or that their actions resulted from some negligent act of the master, or of some person for whose acts he is responsible.⁹⁴ Likewise, negligence of the master ordinarily is a question for the jury where the injuries to a serv-

Credibility of witnesses

In action under Federal Employers' Liability Act, fact that testimony of plaintiff's only witness who testified to improper condition of engine wheel was contradicted by several witnesses of defendant, including two inspectors from Interstate Commerce Commission, and that plaintiff's witness had been discharged by defendant, did not render testimony insufficient to go to jury—Crain v. Illinois Cent R Co, 73 SW 2d 786, 385 Mo 658, certiorari denied Illinois Cent R. Co v Crain, 55 S.Ct. 123, 298 U.S. 607, 79 L Ed 698.

Evidence held sufficient to go to jury on question

(1) Whether locomotive boiler is in condition required by Boiler Inspection Act § 2, 45 U.S.C.A. § 23.—

is no evidence tending to show any negligence of the master regarding the condition of a locomotive and its appurtenances, the case should not be submitted to the jury.² Whether or not an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to handholds on "cars" applies to tenders which are parts of locomotives is a question of law and should not be left to the jury to determine.³

Engineering question Under the Federal Boiler Inspection Act § 2, 45 U.S.C.A. § 23, requiring locomotive boilers and their appurtenances to be in such condition as to permit their use without unnecessary danger, it has been held that it is not for the courts to lay down rules which will restrict carriers in their choice of mechanical means by which the locomotive boilers are to be kept in the proper condition, nor are such matters to be left to the varying and uncertain opinions or verdicts of juries, since the matters are engineering questions.⁴

The question of the master's negligence in respect of railroad cars and their appliances is a question for the court in the absence of a conflict of evidence or where the evidence so clearly preponderates that a verdict to the contrary should be set aside, but where the evidence is substantially conflicting the question is one for the jury.

The question of the master's negligence in respect of railroad cars and their appliances is a question for the court in the absence of a conflict of evidence⁵ or where the evidence so clearly preponderates that, in the exercise of sound discretion, a verdict to the contrary should be set aside,⁶ but where the evidence is substantially in conflict the question of the master's negligence is ordinarily one for the jury where a servant is injured by reason of a defect in, or want of, a hand hold and the like,⁷ step,³ or brake⁹ of a railroad car, or by other defective or dangerous conditions of a car

Held not engineering question

In action for death of fireman, who either fell or was knocked from tender by a low viaduct while attempting to return to engine cab over coal bin while returning from "doghouse" on tender where he had gone for shelter after a drenching received while taking on water in subzero weather, issue of whether facilities furnished constituted negligence was not an engineering question solely within jurisdiction of Interstate Commerce Commission but was a question for jury—O'Brien v Chicago & N W Ry Co, 68 NE 3d 638, 329 Ill App 382

(e) Railroad Tracks and Roadbeds

Whether a railroad company has been negligent in maintaining a railroad track or roadbed, or obstructions or erections on, over, or near railroad tracks, whereby an employee is injured, ordinarily is a question for the jury, although the case should not be submitted to the jury in the absence of evidence of negligence. It has been held that purely engineering questions should not be submitted to the jury.

Whether a railroad company has been negligent in maintaining a railroad track or roadbed ordinarily is a question for the jury,¹⁸ although the case should not be submitted to the jury where there is no evidence of negligence of a railroad company in respect of its track or roadbed.¹⁹ Among the various defects and dangers in tracks and roadbeds which have resulted in injuries to employees and have been held to raise questions for the jury are holes, ditches, etc.,²⁰ or obstructions, debris, and the like, between or along the tracks,²¹ low joints of the railroad company³² The want of a telltale or a defect therein resulting in injury to a servant by reason of being struck by an overhead bridge or other structure may raise a question of negligence for the jury³³ Where cars are left on an adjoining track so close to the passing track that they cannot be passed safely and a servant is injured thereby, the question of negligence may be one for the jury under the evidence,³⁴ but the mere placing of tracks so close together that cars moving thereon have barely enough room to pass, where such condition results from the necessity of using a public street, is not enough to support an inference of negligence³⁵ As to injuries received by a servant by reason of being crushed between a locomotive or car and a door jamb of a roundhouse or similar structure, whether a railroad company is negligent in failing to provide a reasonably safe place to work has been held to raise³⁶ or not to raise³⁷ a question for the jury, the rule in the latter instance being based on the principle that entry into or exit from a closed building, through a doorway, is a very different matter from the proximity of water tanks, mail cranes, signal

posts, and the like which may result in injuries to an employee³⁸ Where a mail crane is maintained at the same distance from a railroad track as other mail cranes, the question as to negligence in maintaining may not be submitted to the jury,³⁹ although the question may be submitted where it appears that the crane could have been located at a greater distance from the track and still operate efficiently⁴⁰

Engineering questions. The broad rule has been laid down that it is against public policy for courts to lay down rules as to the manner of the construction of railroads or to submit to a jury for decision purely engineering questions of railroad construction, in an action by a servant to recover damages for injuries sustained by him,⁴¹ and the rule has been held applicable specifically to curves in a railroad track⁴² There is authority opposed to this general rule,⁴³ and there is also authority which does not deny the rule in its entirety, but holds that it should not be extended beyond its specific application⁴⁴ Furthermore, neither the general doctrine nor its specific application prevents a submission to the jury of the negligence of a railroad in the method of using the track.⁴⁵

While it is true that ordinarily the location of apparatus or structures in proximity to railroad tracks is a matter in which a jury is not allowed to review the judgment of the locating engineers, and the jury should not be allowed to infer negligence where there was ample need or propriety of the location of a structure deviating from the standard location of such a structure, where it is unexplained, and was apparently unnecessarily dangerous, it has a substantial tendency to show negligence as against a servant ignorant and unwarned, and a question for determination of the jury is presented—Emch v Pennsylvania R Co, CCA Ohio, 87 F2d 828

The question of the master's negligence ordinarily is for the jury where the evidence shows that a servant was injured by reason of the defective or dangerous condition of a building.

The question of the master's negligence ordinarily is for the jury where the evidence shows that a servant was injured by reason of the defective or dangerous condition of a building,⁴⁶ and this rule has been applied where the injury is attributable to a floor that is defective⁴⁷ or slippery⁴⁸ or that has uncovered or unguarded holes or openings therein,⁴⁹ or to the want of a proper exit or escape in case of a fire,⁵⁰ or to the dangerous condition of a trap-door.⁵¹

the absence of evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the master there is no question for the jury.⁸¹

(k) Shipping

The question of negligence of the master in respect of the condition or operation of a vessel or of appliances used in loading the vessel whereby a servant is injured is for the jury where evidence tends to show such negligence, but not in the absence of evidence of negligence.

Where evidence tends to show negligence whereby a servant is injured, it is for the jury to determine the question of negligence on the part of a master in respect of the condition or operation of a vessel⁸² or of appliances used in loading the vessel,⁸³ but not where the evidence fails to show any negligence on the part of the master.⁸⁴

(6) Covering or Guarding Dangerous Machinery or Places

On conflicting evidence, whether a master is negligent in failing to cover or guard dangerous places or machinery and whether he has complied with statutes providing for guards ordinarily is for the jury to determine.

On conflicting evidence, whether a master is negligent in failing to cover or guard dangerous places ordinarily is a question for the jury.⁸⁵ As discussed supra §§ 231-234, numerous statutes provide for the guarding of machinery, or specified parts thereof, and other places, and ordinarily it is for the jury to determine, under proper instructions, whether in a particular case it is practicable to provide guards⁸⁶ or necessary to do so,⁸⁷ or whether there has been a compliance with the statute.⁸⁸

The question of the master's negligence ordinarily is for the jury in respect of covering or guarding machinery in general,⁸⁹ or specifically such machin-

The question of the master's negligence should not be submitted to the jury, but should be determined by the court, where there is no conflict of evidence as to the practicability of guarding machinery or dangerous places,¹⁵ or the necessity therefor,¹⁶ or as to the maintenance of a proper guard.¹⁷ It has been held that the failure to guard machinery as required by statute is evidence only of negligence to be submitted to the jury on the question of negligence.¹⁸ On the other hand, it has been held that the failure to guard machinery belonging to certain specified classes required by statute to be guarded constitutes negligence per se.¹⁹ Whether certain parts of machinery as to the character of which there is no dispute belong to a certain specified class required to be guarded is a question of law for the court.²⁰

(7) Inspection and Test

Evidence of the master's failure to make a proper inspection and test at reasonable times generally raises a question for the jury in an action for injuries to a servant, and ordinarily it is for the jury to determine whether the defect causing the injury was discoverable by reasonable inspection; but the question of negligence should not be submitted to the jury where the evidence is insufficient to raise the issue.

Passageway and "narrow work"

It was for the jury to determine whether room in coal mine from which all coal has been removed had become a mere passageway which it was the employer's duty to inspect, and whether an entryway was "narrow work" thereby placing on the employer the duty to inspect it—Biondi v. Central Coal & Coke Co, App, 297 SW 171, affirmed 9 SW 2d 596, 320 Mo 1130

er it was the master's duty to make an inspection, or the servant's, is a question for the jury on conflicting evidence.²⁷ The reasonableness²⁸ and sufficiency²⁹ of an inspection, where made, is also a question of fact for the jury.

The question of his negligence should not be submitted to the jury where there is no evidence tending to show that the master failed to make a proper inspection,³⁰ where the evidence that he made a reasonable inspection is uncontradicted,³¹ or where the evidence supports no facts which would suggest to the employer a condition which would excite suspicion of defects or danger and thus require an inspection to be made.³²

(8) Repairs

On conflicting evidence it is for the jury to determine questions relating to the master's negligence based on failure to make proper repairs.

On conflicting evidence, it is for the jury to determine the question of the master's negligence in respect of failing to make repairs,³³ or as to the manner of making repairs,³⁴ or as to taking proper precautions to prevent the use of the appliance being repaired,³⁵ as well as what would be a reasonable time for making repairs³⁶ and whether a reasonable time had elapsed after a promise to repair.³⁷ The repair of a machine by a reputable maker has been held not sufficient to relieve an employer from negligence for defects therein as a matter of law,³⁸ although there appears to be authority to the contrary.³⁹

g. Latent or Obvious Dangers

On sufficient evidence the questions whether a danger was latent or obvious, and was discoverable by due care, and the liability of the master for injuries from a latent defect are questions for the jury.

On sufficient evidence it is for the jury to determine the questions whether a danger was latent or obvious,⁴⁰ and was discoverable by the exercise of due care,⁴¹ and the liability of the master for injuries from a latent defect.⁴² The questions should not be submitted, however, where the testimony is undisputed⁴³ or insufficient to raise the issues.⁴⁴

h. Knowledge by Master of Defect or Danger

The question of the master's negligence should be submitted to the jury where injuries to a servant were caused by a defect or danger which the evidence tends to show was known, or in the exercise of reasonable care should have been known, to the master.

Thus it is ordinarily for the jury to determine whether the defect or danger was known to the master⁴⁶ or by the exercise of due care should have been known to him,⁴⁷ and whether he took reasonable precautions to remedy the defects or obviate the danger,⁴⁸ whether the danger was so remote that the master could not by chance have had knowledge of it,⁴⁹ and whether the master could or should have anticipated the accident or injury.⁵⁰

Negligence of joint user of track Where an employer permits the joint use of its tracks by another railroad company and the servant is injured by the joint user's negligent manner of using the track as to which the employer has no knowledge, the question of the employer's negligence should not be submitted to the jury.⁸⁶

j. Rules

- (1) Construction
- (2) Duty to promulgate and enforce
- (3) Existence and applicability
- (4) Reasonableness and sufficiency
- (5) Waiver

(1) Construction

The construction of rules promulgated by a master ordinarily is a question of law for the court; but, where they are uncertain and ambiguous, on conflicting evidence their construction becomes a question for the jury.

The construction of rules promulgated by a master is a question of law for the court.⁸⁷ Rules are within statutes requiring courts to declare the terms and substance of instruments.⁸⁸ Where, however, they are uncertain and ambiguous, on conflicting evidence their construction becomes a question for the jury.⁸⁹

(2) Duty to Promulgate and Enforce

Whether a master was negligent in making and promulgating rules for the protection of his servants, or in failing to use due care and diligence, after the promulgation of a necessary rule, to have it enforced, is, on conflicting evidence, a question for the jury, but the question is for the court in the absence of any evidence showing the necessity, practicability, and utility of such rules or where the evidence shows that the injury complained of was caused by a needless violation of a valid and reasonable rule.

Whether a master was negligent in making and promulgating rules for the protection of his servants, or in failing to use due care and diligence, after the promulgation of a necessary rule, to have it enforced, is, under evidence from which reasonable men might differ as to whether the duty has been performed, a question for the jury,⁹⁰ and this rule has been applied where the question arose as to the promulgation and enforcement of a rule for giving of warnings and signals in carrying on dangerous operations.⁹¹ The question whether the

Duty to obey signals

In an action by a brakeman injured while opening the knuckle on a car so that a coupling might be made, where the uncontroverted evidence showed that the engine was operated exclusively by signals, the question as to the duty of the engineer to obey signals was one of law for the court.—St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Matlock, Tex. Civ. App., 141 S.W. 1067, error refused.

Engineering problem

Judgment of railroad company's engineers in omitting requirement of turning retainer valve handles up on down grades, reached after survey of railroad's grade and brake system, cannot be reviewed by jury with view of finding actionable negligence.—*Hylton v. Claim of existence as evidence of necessity

Master's claim that it had rule was held admission justifying finding by jury that rule was reasonably required, making case for submission to jury.—Wilson v. George H. Taylor & Co., 136 A. 260, 83 N.H. 488.

Particular questions held for jury under evidence

(1) Whether by exercise of reasonable care place of work could have been made reasonably safe by establishment and observance of safety rules.—Tombigbee Mill & Lumber Co. v. Hollingsworth, CCA Miss., 162 F.2d 763.

(2) Whether road construction company prescribed reasonably safe rules and methods for storage and handling of gasoline and kerosene used in work of constructing highway.—Curry & Turner Const. Co. v. Bryan, 186 So. 256, 184 Miss. 44.

91. Ind.—Harris v. Chicago & E. I. Ry. Co., 158 N.E. 636, 87 Ind. App. 11.

master was negligent is for the court, however, in the absence of any evidence showing the necessity, practicability, and utility of such rules,⁹² or where the evidence clearly shows that the injury complained of was caused by a needless violation of a valid and reasonable rule.⁹³ The danger may be so obvious as to suggest of itself the necessity of regulations to an ordinarily prudent master, so that their absence might be considered negligence as a matter of law,⁹⁴ or that the court may submit the question of negligence to the jury although there is no evidence showing that other employers in the same business had made rules for similar situations.⁹⁵

(3) Existence and Applicability

The questions as to the existence of rules, or notice thereof to the servant, or their applicability to the case are for the jury on conflicting evidence, and for the court where the evidence is not conflicting or in the absence of evidence as to their applicability.

On conflicting evidence it is for the jury to determine questions as to the existence of rules,⁹⁶ or notice thereof to the servant,⁹⁷ or their applicability to the case.⁹⁸ The question is one for the court, however, where the evidence is not conflicting⁹⁹ or in the absence of evidence as to their applicability.¹

(4) Reasonableness and Sufficiency

Questions as to the reasonableness and sufficiency of rules ordinarily are held to be for the jury where there is evidence on which to base a submission of the question.

There appears to be a conflict of authority as to whether the reasonableness of any rule for the government of servants in the course of their employment presents a question for the court or for the jury, some decisions holding that it is a question of law for the court² and other decisions laying down the doctrine that whether the question is to be decided by the court or submitted to the jury depends on the raising of fact by the evidence,³ the jury to be properly instructed in the premises if the evidence requires submission of the question.⁴ The adequacy and sufficiency of a rule present a question for the jury,⁵ provided there is any evidence on which to base a submission of the question.⁶

The rule obtains in the federal courts that, when a railroad has adopted a system of rules which have been made familiar to its employees, and its railroad is operated under them with success, that question is not to be submitted to the varying determination of juries as a question of fact, but must be determined as a question of law⁷ in the absence of any conflict of expert testimony on the question of their reasonableness and sufficiency.⁸

(5) Waiver

The question whether an employer's rule has been waived or abandoned is for the jury to determine unless the evidence is insufficient to charge the master with notice of the acts relied on to establish a waiver or abandonment.

The question whether a rule of an employer respecting the conduct of his business has been waived or abandoned by him is for the jury⁹ unless the evidence is insufficient to charge the master with notice of the acts relied on to establish a waiver or abandonment.¹⁰

k. Orders

Where there is evidence on which to base its submission, the questions whether an order was given and whether it was negligently given are for the jury; but the construction of an order may be for the court or jury, depending on the circumstances.

Where there is evidence on which to base its submission, it is for the jury to determine whether an order was or was not in fact given,¹¹ and, if so, whether it was negligently given.¹² The construction of an order usually is a question for the jury,¹³ but there is some authority holding that the construction is for the court,¹⁴ at least where the order is not ambiguous on its face and no facts raise a latent ambiguity in its meaning,¹⁵ and, when

1. Warning and Instructing Servant

Whether the master was guilty of negligence with respect to warning and instructing the injured servant, and the sufficiency of warnings and instructions given, are questions of fact for the jury if there is evidence warranting the submission of the questions, but in the absence of such evidence the questions should not be submitted to the jury.

In accordance with well-settled general principles, whether the master was guilty of negligence with respect to warning and instructing the injured servant is a question of fact for the jury if there is any evidence tending to show such negligence.¹⁷ Ordinarily it is for the jury to determine whether

Matters to be considered by jury

In determining whether boy was sufficiently instructed by employer

less the evidence that the employee was properly instructed is not contradicted²⁴

§ 535. — Fellow Servants and Coemployees

- a. Adequacy and competency of working force
- b. Liability of master for negligence of fellow servant

a. Adequacy and Competency of Working Force

Provided the evidence is sufficient therefor, it is for the jury to determine whether an employer has furnished an adequate and competent working force or has been negligent in that respect.

In an action by an employee for injuries alleged to have been suffered as a result of the employer's violation of his duty to furnish an adequate and competent working force, which duty is considered supra §§ 307-319, it is ordinarily for the jury to determine whether a sufficient number of servants has been furnished for the particular work²⁵ or assigned to a particular task;²⁶ or whether there has been negligence as to furnishing a sufficient number of employees,²⁷ or assigning them to the particular work²⁸ However, it is otherwise where the evidence is insufficient to warrant submission of the issues to the jury²⁹

Likewise it is ordinarily for the jury to determine whether coemployees were competent;³⁰ whether the master was negligent in employing or retaining an incompetent employee,³¹ and whether the incompetency of the employee was the proximate cause of the injury,³² but, similarly, such questions should not be submitted to the jury when not presented by the evidence.³³

as to danger inherent in his work, a jury could take into consideration not only the warnings given by the employer but also the fact that danger was or should have been obvious to the boy—Shaw v Kendall, 136 P 2d 748, 114 Mont 323

b. Liability of Master for Negligence of Fellow Servant

- (1) In general
- (2) Existence of relationship of fellow servant
- (3) Negligence of coemployee or fellow servant
- (4) Failure in nondelegable duty
- (5) Proximate cause

(1) In General

In general, questions relating to a master's liability for injuries to a servant caused by the negligence of a fellow servant are to be determined by the jury, unless the evidence is undisputed or permits of but one inference.

In general, questions relating to the liability of an employer or master for injuries suffered by an employee or servant resulting from the negligence of a coemployee or fellow servant, which liability is considered supra §§ 321-356, are to be determined by the jury where the evidence on the question is conflicting or permits of more than one inference;³⁴ but, where the facts are undisputed or permit of but one inference, the question is one for the court.³⁵

Applicability of statutes. Where the evidence is in conflict, it is for the jury to determine whether particular facts exist rendering applicable statutes affecting the liability of the master for injuries occasioned by the act of a coemployee,³⁶ as, for example, whether the character of employment is within the statute,³⁷ whether servants are in the same grade of employment,³⁸ whether a particular employee is intrusted with the duty of superintendence,³⁹ or is in control,⁴⁰ or whether an act is one of superintendence,⁴¹ or is the proximate cause of injury.⁴²

(2) Existence of Relationship of Fellow Servant

Except where the evidence is such as to warrant but one reasonable conclusion, it is for the jury to determine questions relating to whether particular employees were fellow servants, such as whether a servant was acting as a representative of the master.

Where the facts are undisputed or but one reasonable conclusion may be drawn from the evidence, the question whether servants of a common master stand in the relation of fellow servants may be a question of law for the court.⁴³ It is, however, ordinarily a question of fact or of mixed law and fact to be determined by the jury under proper instructions.⁴⁴ Similarly, where servants of different masters are employed in the same work, it is ordinarily for the jury to determine under proper

Further, when involved in the determination of whether particular employees are fellow servants, it is for the jury to determine, in case of a conflict in the evidence as to the facts, whether the relationship of master and servant has been established,⁴⁶ whether the injured servant was acting within the scope of his employment,⁴⁷ whether the employee to whom the injury was attributed was acting within his employment⁴⁸ or authority,⁴⁹ although what acts are within the scope of the employment is a question of law,⁵⁰ whether servants are employed in the same department;⁵¹ or whether direct co-operation or habitual association is established.⁵²

Servant as representative of master It is also for the jury to determine, on conflicting evidence, whether a particular act is performed as representative of the master⁵³ or is in the performance of a primary or nondelegable duty of the master,⁵⁴ such as the furnishing of a safe place to work,⁵⁵ furnishing safe tools and appliances,⁵⁶ superintendence,⁵⁷ inspection,⁵⁸ or repair.⁵⁹ So, where the doctrine of dual capacity is recognized, it is, on conflicting evidence, a question of fact for the jury whether the servant was acting as a vice principal or as a fellow servant,⁶⁰ but, where the facts are undisputed, the question is for the court.⁶¹

(3) Negligence of Coemployee or Fellow Servant

Provided there is evidence tending to show it, whether a fellow servant or coemployee has been guilty of negligence is a question for the jury.

Sufficiency of evidence

(1) Plaintiff was entitled to go to jury, if there was any evidence of the question whether a fellow servant or co-employee,⁶³ or vice-principal,⁶⁴ has been guilty of negligence is one of fact for the jury. This rule has been applied in determining whether a fellow servant has been negligent in relation to directions or orders as to the conduct of the work,⁶⁵ or in regard to furnishing tools and appliances,⁶⁶ inspection,⁶⁷ or repairs.⁶⁸ It has also been applied in determining negligence with regard to signals,⁶⁹ warnings,⁷⁰ or other means of protection from dan-negligence of defendant's employee—Hutchinson v Sovrensky, 165 NE 698, 267 Mass 5

(2) Conflicting evidence is sufficient to warrant submission of the case to the jury—Jacobson v Chicago & N W Ry Co, 22 N.W.2d 455, 231 Minn 454

(3) Circumstantial evidence has been held sufficient to warrant submission of the case to the jury—Johnson v Southern Ry Co, 175 S.W.2d 802, 351 Mo 1110

(4) In action under Federal Employers' Liability Act for injuries suffered in lifting heavy rod, where plaintiff-employee testified that a fellow employee suddenly released his hold thereby casting additional weight on plaintiff and causing injuries, employer was not entitled to a directed verdict on theory that deliberate and intentional dropping of rod was not in furtherance of the employer's business—Steeley v Kurn, 157 S.W.2d 212, 348 Mo 1142

handcar or motorcar⁹⁵

Gross negligence and wantonness. The question whether a servant has been guilty of gross negligence is, on conflicting evidence, one of fact for the jury⁹⁶ Whether or not one employee was guilty of wantonness in injuring another has also been held to be a question for the jury.⁹⁷

(4) Failure in Nondelegable Duty

It is ordinarily for the jury to determine, on conflicting evidence, whether or not the negligence of a fellow servant constitutes a failure in the performance of a nondelegable duty of the master

Provided the evidence with regard thereto is conflicting,⁹⁸ it is ordinarily for the jury to determine whether or not the negligence of a coemployee or fellow-servant constitutes a failure in the performance of a primary or nondelegable duty of the master,⁹⁹ such as the furnishing of a safe place to work,¹ the furnishing of safe appliances,² inspection,³ the keeping of appliances safe,⁴ the providing of a safe method of work,⁵ the adoption of necessary rules and regulations⁶ or signal systems,⁷ and the giving of warning and instruction.⁸

(5) Proximate Cause

In cases involving the defense of negligence of fellow servants, proximate cause of the injury is, on conflicting evidence, a question for the jury.

As in cases involving the question of the proximate cause of an employee's injuries generally, as considered supra § 533, in cases involving the defense of negligence of fellow servants, the question of the proximate cause of the injury is on conflicting evidence one of fact for the jury.⁹ However, the question should not be submitted to the jury where there is no substantial conflict in the evidence.¹⁰ Moreover, under the rules authorizing the direction of a verdict generally, the court may, in cases in which the negligence of fellow servants

Inference contradicted by direct testimony

Plaintiff's case, based on inference of collision, from single witness' testimony, and contradicted by direct testimony of other witnesses, was held insufficient for jury's consideration in action against railroad for brakeman's death—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Chamberlain, supra.

constitutes a defense, as considered supra § 321, direct a verdict for defendant where the evidence shows that the injury was caused by such negligence.¹¹

Concurring negligence. Whether the negligence of the master or vice-principal concurs with the negligence of a fellow servant in occasioning the injury is on conflicting evidence a question of fact for the jury.¹²

§ 536. — Assumption of Risk

a. General principles

b. Risks arising from defective or dangerous appliances or places

c. Risks arising from dangerous operations and methods of work

d. Knowledge and appreciation of danger

e. Continuance at work with knowledge of danger

f. Compliance with negligent order, command

g. Negligence of fellow servant

a. General Principles

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, the question of assumption of risk by an injured servant is for the jury to determine unless the evidence thereon is harmonious and consistent and permits of but one conclusion.

Where, on an issue of assumption of risk by a servant who has sustained injuries, the facts are controverted, or such that different inferences may be drawn therefrom, the question as to assumption of risk should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions from the court.¹³ On the other hand, where the evidence is harmonious and consistent, and the circumstances permit of but one conclusion, the question whether plaintiff assumed the risk becomes one of law for the determination of the court, and a submission of such question by the court for the determination of the jury is erroneous¹⁴ Whether an employee assumed a risk created by the negligence of his master is a question for the jury, unless reasonable minds are not likely to differ on the evidence¹⁵ Of course, the question should not be submitted where it is not in the case,¹⁶ as, in some jurisdictions, where the master has been negligent.¹⁷

Violation of rule. The fact that a servant acted in violation of a rule promulgated by the master is not of itself sufficient to charge him with assumption of risk,¹⁸ but it is otherwise where it is clear that the servant fully appreciated the danger which such violation involved.¹⁹

jurisdictions by express constitutional or statutory provisions the question of assumption of risk by the servant must be submitted to the jury.²⁰ Statutory provisions of this nature are valid.²¹ In some of these jurisdictions it has been held that the provision is merely a restatement of the law in relation to trials by jury as it existed prior to the enactment of the provision,²² so that, where the evidence on assumption of risk is uncontradicted, the court must decide the question as a matter of law.²³ In others it has been held that, while such provisions are not merely declaratory of the common law,²⁴ they do not require a submission of the question of assumption of risk where there is no evidence showing any negligence on the part of the employer.²⁵

Where, for some reason, the provisions are inapplicable,²⁶ as, for instance, where a servant must rely on the common-law cause of action by reason of his failure to give the statutory notice,²⁷ the general rule applies, and the question of assumption of risk becomes one for the court where the evidence is uncontroverted, or is such that reasonable men might not draw different conclusions therefrom²⁸

Federal Employers' Liability Act. Under an amendment to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, as discussed supra § 359, it has been held that no case is to be withdrawn from a jury on any theory of assumption of risk²⁹ In cases arising prior to this amendment the courts held that the question of assumption of risk was for the jury unless the evidence was uncontroverted or could lead to but one inference³⁰

b. Risks Arising from Defective or Dangerous Appliances or Places

The assumption of risk arising from defective or dangerous appliances or places is a question for the jury unless the evidence warrants but one inference.

Whether a servant has assumed the risk arising from defective or dangerous appliances and places is usually a question for the jury,³¹ unless the evidence warrants but a single reasonable inference roadbed,⁴⁹ or dangerous obstructions along,⁵⁰ or over,⁵¹ a track, or in or around a railroad yard.⁵²

c. Risks Arising from Dangerous Operations and Methods of Work

Whether a servant assumed the risk of injury resulting from a dangerous operation is a question for the jury where reasonable minds may draw different conclusions from the evidence.

Whether the servant who was injured as a result of a dangerous operation assumed the risk of injury therefrom is a question for the jury, where reasonable minds may draw different conclusions from the evidence.⁵³ However, the question is one of law for the court where the circumstances permit of but one conclusion.⁵⁴ This rule has been applied in a number of cases where the servant was injured in the course of excavating,⁵⁵ blasting,⁵⁶ or founding operations,⁵⁷ or while engaged in the construction or demolition of a building;⁵⁸ or while employed in loading or unloading material,⁵⁹ in moving a heavy object,⁶⁰ or in the operation of rail-

d. Knowledge and Appreciation of Danger

Whether the servant knew and appreciated, or ought to have known, the danger so as to be chargeable with assumption of the risk is a question for the jury unless the evidence warrants but a single inference.

Whether the servant knew and appreciated the danger, or, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought to have known of it so as to be chargeable with the assumption of the risk thereof, is a question for the jury,⁶³ unless the evidence warrants but a single reasonable inference as to such fact,⁶⁴ as where the uncontroverted evidence shows the danger apparent to an ordinarily prudent person and the rendition of services thereafter without complaint.⁶⁵ On conflicting evidence it is for the jury to determine whether the danger was obvious or latent,⁶⁶ and

Youth, inexperience, or mental deficiency It is ordinarily for the jury to determine whether the servant, in view of his youth,⁶⁸ inexperience,⁶⁹ or mental deficiency,⁷⁰ may be said to have fully appreciated the hazard of the employment, although the mere fact of the servant's immaturity will not prevent the court from inferring assumption of risk,

e. Continuance at Work with Knowledge of Danger

Whether continuance at work after knowledge of the danger constitutes assumption of risk is a question for the jury on conflicting evidence. Whether the servant's reliance on the master's assurance of safety or promise to repair affects assumption of risk is similarly a question for the jury on conflicting evidence.

Whether the servant in continuing at the work after knowledge of the danger must be said to have assumed the risk of injury therefrom is a question for the jury, where the evidence is conflicting.⁸¹ Whether the employee failed to complain to the employer of the defective or dangerous condition is also generally a question for the jury in determining whether the employee assumed the risk by continuing at work.⁸²

Reliance on promise to repair. It is for the jury to determine whether the servant was relieved of assuming the risk of injury from a known or obvious danger by reason of a reliance on the master's promise that the dangerous condition would be remedied,⁸³ unless the facts are such that all reasonable persons must draw the same conclusion therefrom.⁸⁴

Reliance on assurance of safety. Whether the servant, knowing of the danger, was justified in undertaking the work in reliance on the master's assurance of safety is a question for the jury, where reasonable minds may draw different conclusions from the evidence.⁸⁵

Whether the servant who was injured while executing an order of the master fully appreciated the hazard of the undertaking so as to be chargeable with assuming the risk of injury ordinarily is a question for the jury.

Whether the servant who was injured while executing an order of the master or a representative of the master, fully appreciated the hazard of the undertaking so as to be chargeable with assuming the risk of injury therefrom ordinarily is a question for the jury,⁸⁶ but, where it must be evident to all reasonable minds that the danger was one which no prudent person would have encountered, the servant will be precluded from a recovery as a matter of law.⁸⁷ Where an employee is acting under the threat or command of his master or a vice-principal, whether the danger is so obvious or imminent that a prudent man would not have been willing to encounter it even under such orders is usually a question for the jury.⁸⁸

Whether an employee has assumed the risk of injury due to the negligence of his coemployees or their incompetency or insufficiency in number is a question for the jury to determine, where the evidence is such that reasonable minds may differ on such question.

b. Specific rules

c. Application to particular dangers

a. General Principles

In general, contributory negligence is a mixed question of law and fact to be submitted to the jury whenever the evidence is inconclusive or permits of different inferences.

Based on well settled principles governing the procedure in the trial of all civil actions, contributory negligence, like assumption of risk, is a mixed question of law and fact, and should be submitted to the jury, under proper instructions, whenever the evidence is inconclusive or where it is such that different inferences may legitimately be drawn therefrom.⁹⁵ However, where the evidence is conclusive

one way or the other, or is of such a character that but one inference can be drawn from it by all reasonable minds, the question whether plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence becomes one of law for the determination of the court, and it is error for the court to submit it to the jury.⁸⁶ Where there is no evidence of the master's negligence, there is no necessity for a submission to the jury of the issue of contributory negligence,⁹⁷ and the same is true where it appears that the risk was one assumed by the servant.⁹⁸ Similarly, where no issue of contributory negligence is raised by defendant, such issue should not be submitted to the jury.⁹⁹

Willful negligence. In a jurisdiction where, under the statute, only willful negligence on the part of the servant is sufficient to defeat recovery, the question whether the conduct of the servant constituted such negligence is for the jury, the evidence being conflicting.¹

Constitutional and statutory provisions. In some constitutions and statutes, provision is made that the question of contributory negligence shall be one for the jury,² but, unless a contrary intention clearly appears,³ such provisions are construed as being merely declaratory of the existing law.⁴ Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, providing that the employee's contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the employee, it has been held that the question of the employee's contributory negligence must be submitted to the jury,⁵ but, where there is no evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the employer, there is no issue of contributory negligence which should go to a jury.⁶ A statutory change in the burden of proof on the issue of contributory negligence has been held not to affect the question of law presented by a motion for a directed verdict provided the facts surrounding the accident are fully disclosed.⁷

- (7) Compliance with, or disobedience of, rule or order
 (8) Injury avoidable by final effort of master

(1) In General

Ordinarily, it is for the jury to determine whether at the time of the injury the servant was acting within the scope of his authority or employment or whether he was negligent in disregarding a warning of danger

Where there is evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the servant, it is for the jury to determine whether at the time of the injury the servant was acting within the scope of his authority or employment,⁸ unless the facts are such that all reasonable persons must draw the same inference

therefrom⁹

Disregard of warning. Where the evidence is conflicting on the issue of the servant's negligence in disregarding a warning of danger, the question should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions.¹⁰

(2) Proximate Cause

Whether the servant's negligence was a proximate cause, or the sole proximate cause, of the injury is a question for the jury where the facts are in dispute.

Whether the alleged negligence of the servant was a proximate cause of the injury complained of is a question for the determination of the jury, where the facts are in dispute,¹¹ but it is otherwise where from the entire evidence it appears that no other reasonable conclusion could be reached than that the injury resulted proximately from the servant's negligent act or omission¹²

(3) Inadvertent Acts, Acts in Emergency

Whether a servant is guilty of contributory negligence because of his conduct in an emergency or because he was momentarily inattentive or acted under a mistake of judgment is a question for the jury.

The fact that a servant was momentarily inattentive to the task in hand,¹³ or acted under an ordinary mistake of judgment,¹⁴ does not, as a matter of law, warrant the conclusion that he was guilty of contributory negligence. Mere temporary forgetfulness of a known danger does not constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law.¹⁵ Whether the conduct of the servant, confronted by a sudden and imminent peril, conformed to the legal standard of ordinary care is generally a question for the jury, the evidence being in conflict¹⁶

(4) Choice of Unsafe Appliance, Passage-way, Place, or Method of Work

Generally, an employee's choice of an unsafe appliance, route, or passageway, place or position of work, or method of work is not contributory negligence as a matter of law, but raises a question for the jury.

Generally, the mere choice by a servant of an unsafe appliance,¹⁷ of an unsafe route or passageway,¹⁸ or of an unsafe method of performing the task in hand,¹⁹ is not of itself sufficient to charge him with contributory negligence as a matter of law. Similarly, it is generally held that whether an employee's choice of an unsafe place, or his assumption of an unsafe position, for the performance of his work constitutes negligence is a question for the jury, and that such choice is not contributory negligence as a matter of law.²⁰ However, where the evidence undisputably shows that the choice was one that no prudent man would have made, the question of the servant's negligence is properly withheld from the jury.²¹

(5) Knowledge and Appreciation of Danger or Defect

Whether a servant, particularly a youthful or inexperienced one, knew and appreciated the danger, or ought to have known of it in the exercise of reasonable care, is a question for the jury on disputed facts.

glaring and obvious that reasonable men could not differ, the court must declare the conduct contributory negligence as a matter of law.²⁷

Youthful or inexperienced servant Whether a youthful servant²⁸ or one who is inexperienced²⁹ appreciated the danger, and acted with the degree of care commensurate with his age or experience, are questions for the jury, the evidence being in conflict.

(6) Continuance at Work with Knowledge of Danger

Whether a servant was negligent in continuing at work after he became aware of the danger is generally a question for the jury, especially where he relied on the master's assurance of safety or promise to repair. Whether the failure of the servant to adopt precautions against known danger constituted negligence is a question for the jury on disputed evidence.

Whether a servant was wanting in common prudence in continuing at the work after he became aware of the danger is for the jury to determine, where reasonable minds may differ on the question.³⁰ Whether a servant is guilty of contributory negligence in continuing at work after notice or complaint to the master of defects or dangers is similarly generally a question of fact for the jury.³¹

any evidence tending to show that the servant, in undertaking the work on the master's assurance of safety, acted as a reasonably prudent person would have acted under the circumstances, the question of contributory negligence is for the jury.³²

Reliance on promise to repair Whether the servant undertook the work in reliance on the master's promise to remedy the dangerous condition, and whether he was justified in such undertaking, are questions for the jury, where the facts are in dispute.³³

the servant was negligent in failing to adopt the precautionary measures that a prudent person in like case would have adopted,³⁴ unless the facts are such that but one reasonable inference may be drawn therefrom.³⁵

(7) Compliance with, or Disobedience of, Rule or Order

Whether a servant was guilty of negligence in violating a rule or disobeying or complying with an order is usually a question for the jury.

Purpose of rule as factor

Evidence that servant injured while operating replaner was "supposed" to use only one-inch lumber on replaner when set for certain thickness, and that lumber used was of various thicknesses, was insufficient to require finding of contributory negligence as matter of law, in absence of evidence that supposed rule was a safety regulation established for servant's protection—Morin v Champlin, 43 A 2d 772, 93 NH 422

Customary or habitual violation of rule

(1) Whether employer's rule respecting employee's riding on motor was habitually disregarded with knowledge or acquiescence of employer's agents and servants, superior in authority to injured employee, was held question for jury—Southern Mining Co v Hensley, 56 SW 2d 965, 247 Ky 276

(2) Where evidence showing ha-

an order,³⁷ of the master, is one of fact for the determination of the jury, unless the evidence is such that there is no reasonable ground for a difference of opinion as to such fact.³⁸

Compliance with negligent order It is for the jury to determine whether the servant, in complying with an order of the master involving extraordinary and unnecessary hazard, acted as a reasonably careful person would have acted under the circumstances,³⁹ unless the act directed was fraught with such imminent and apparent danger that no reasonable man would have attempted it.⁴⁰

(8) Injury Avoidable by Final Effort of Master

Although the servant's negligence placed him in a position of peril, whether his subsequent conduct precludes or affects his recovery, or whether the negligence of the master intervened, is a question for the jury, unless the evidence permits of one inference.

Although the servant was initially negligent in placing himself in a position of peril, whether his subsequent conduct was such as to preclude a recovery or warrant a diminution of the damages, or whether the negligence of the master intervened, is a question for the jury,⁴¹ unless the facts are

Whether the servant was negligent in the operation of dangerous or defective machinery, or in coming in contact with unguarded machinery, or in oiling or adjusting machinery while in motion is a question for the jury on conflicting evidence

In accordance with the rule that contributory negligence and issues relating thereto are questions for the jury unless the evidence is conclusive or is of such character that only one inference can be drawn from it by all reasonable minds, discussed supra subdivision a of this section, the question whether the servant was negligent in the operation of a dangerous or defective machine⁴⁴ or in coming into contact with unguarded machinery while thereabout employed⁴⁵ has been held, where the evidence is conflicting, to be left to the determination of a jury Thus, in such case, it is for the jury to say whether the servant was negligent in attempting to oil⁴⁶ or to clean or adjust⁴⁷ machinery without stop-

Delay in removal to hospital

Evidence of negligence of other train employees under the "humanitarian doctrine" in failing to transport a seriously injured trainman by motor ambulance to a city hospital twenty-eight miles away and in attempting to transport the injured brakeman by freight train to a hospital fifty-nine miles away, the brakeman dying before arrival, was insufficient for jury, where the fault, if any, of the trainmen was an error of judgment for which the railroad would not be liable—Kurn v Denison, 10 So 2d 198, 193 Miss 763

Failure to blow whistle

Where evidence established that engineer had blown three signals within fifteen to thirty seconds before observing automobile which approached the crossing on a road in open country, failure of engineer to blow whistle again after discovering the automobile did not authorize submission of question of railroad's negligence under "last clear chance" doctrine—Southern Ry Co v Melton, 198 So 588, 240 Ala 244

Failure to reverse engine

Engineer's undisputed testimony that it would not have been helpful to stop train any quicker if engineer had reversed engine instead of merely applying brakes, shutting off steam, and opening sandbox, precluded submission to jury under "last clear chance" doctrine of question of engineer's negligence in failing to reverse the engine—Southern Ry Co v Melton, supra.

ping its motion; and whether the servant who was injured by reason of the unexpected starting of the machinery was guilty of negligence in assuming an unsafe position, or in failing to take precautionary measures against such starting, is likewise a question for the jury where the facts are in dispute.⁴⁸ However, where the evidence on the question as to the negligence of the servant, injured in the course of his employment at or about dangerous or defective machinery, permits of but one inference it is one of law for the determination of the court.⁴⁹

(b) Railroads

Whether a servant injured in the course of his employment in connection with a railroad was guilty of contributory negligence is a question for the jury where the evidence is conflicting.

Whether the servant injured in the course of his employment in connection with a railroad was guilty of contributory negligence is a question for the jury where the evidence is conflicting.⁵⁰ Thus, in such case, it is for the jury to determine whether the servant was negligent in failing to avoid injury from a known or discoverable defect or danger in a locomotive,⁵¹ car,⁵² track,⁵³ or roadbed,⁵⁴ or whether he was negligent in operating a train, locomotive, or car in such manner as to cause a collision⁵⁵ or derailment,⁵⁶ or whether he was negligent with reference to adopting an unsafe method of adjusting a coupling between cars.⁵⁷

Where the facts are in dispute, it is for the jury to say whether there was negligence on the part of the servant who, while on a track, was struck by a car or locomotive,⁵⁸ or was crushed while passing between standing cars,⁵⁹ or was injured in the attempt to board,⁶⁰ or alight from,⁶¹ a moving car or locomotive; and whether the servant, who, while riding on a car or locomotive, was thrown from his support,⁶² or was brought into contact with an obstruction beside or over the track,⁶³ or was injured in a collision⁶⁴ or derailment of trains or cars,⁶⁵ was guilty of contributory negligence in occupying an unsafe place or assuming an unsafe position, is for the jury, where reasonable persons may draw different conclusions as to such fact. It is for the jury to determine, on conflicting evidence, whether the servant, who was injured by reason of the unexpected movement of the train, car, or locomotive at which he was working, was guilty of negligence in assuming a dangerous position or in failing to take precautionary measures against such movement.⁶⁶

Under the evidence in some cases, the question as to the contributory negligence of the servant who was injured in the course of his employment on a railroad was held to be one for the court.⁶⁷

(c) Other Appliances or Places

The rule that questions of contributory negligence usually are for the jury has been applied to questions of contributory negligence in connection with various dangerous or defective appliances or places.

The rule that questions of contributory negligence are for the jury unless the evidence permits of but one inference has been applied in determining whether an employee, injured in connection with other dangerous or defective appliances or places, was chargeable with contributory negligence.⁶⁸ Thus the question of contributory negligence has been held to be one for the jury where the servant was charged with failing to exercise due care in the selection or use of a defective or dangerous implement.⁶⁹ Also it is a question for the jury on conflicting evidence whether the employee was contributorily negligent in the course of his employment in connection with motor vehicles.⁷⁰

Electrical apparatus Whether a servant, injured by contact with an electrically charged wire or conductor⁷¹ or other appliance,⁷² or by the fall of a supporting pole,⁷³ was guilty of contributory negligence ordinarily is a question for the jury unless the evidence warrants but a single reasonable inference as to such fact.⁷⁴

§ 538. Instructions

- a In general
- b Requests for instructions
- c Submission of issues, invading province of jury

a. In General

In an action against an employer for injuries to his servant, the instructions should fully and clearly state the law applicable to the case.

As in civil actions generally, in an action against an employer for injuries to his servant the instructions should fully and clearly state the law applicable to the case,¹² defining, limiting, and explaining, when necessary, the different terms or expressions used¹³ The instructions must be certain and definite,¹⁴ and pertinent,¹⁵ and not argumentative,¹⁶ speculative,¹⁷ or confusing, misleading, or contradictory¹⁸ In order to be sufficient, an instruction should be complete in itself¹⁹ The instructions should be considered as a whole, and if, taken together, they fairly and fully present the law, they are not objectionable,²⁰ but where the different paragraphs of the charge are not properly connect-

c. Submission of Issues; Invading Province of Jury

In an action against an employer to recover for injuries to an employee, the instructions must not ignore or exclude issues material to the cause or invade the province of the jury.

In accordance with the rules relating to ignoring or excluding issues, theories, or defenses generally, the instructions must not ignore a material matter in issue or withdraw or exclude it from the jury,³⁰ nor must they ignore material evidence³¹ or assume, as a matter of law, the existence or nonexistence of a fact in dispute³² Failure to instruct on matters not pleaded and not in issue is not error³³ An instruction must be supported by some evidence³⁴ In charging the jury, the court should not assume the existence of facts to prove which there is no evidence³⁵ or which the evidence shows not to exist³⁶ An instruction should not single out and give undue prominence to any portion of the evidence, or direct the attention of the jury from the main issue and cause it to decide the whole case on a mere subordinate issue³⁷ An instruction which is a mere statement of fact is erroneous³⁸ and properly refused³⁹ It is not error to assume the existence of a fact which is admitted or established⁴⁰ or to fail to instruct as to undisputed or immaterial matters⁴¹ It is proper for the court, in charging the jury, to require it to find whether the evidence establishes the existence of the specified group of facts which, if true, would in law establish plaintiff's cause of action or defendant's defense,⁴² and to instruct the jury that, if they find such group of

§ 539. — Conformity to Pleadings and Evidence; Theory of Case

In an action against an employer to recover for injuries to an employee, the instructions must conform and be confined to the issues raised by the pleadings and evidence.

In an action against an employer to recover for injuries to an employee, the instructions must conform and be confined to the issues raised by the pleadings and evidence.⁴⁴ Where the pleadings warrant it and evidence on which to base an instruction has been introduced, either party is entitled to an instruction on his theory of the case,⁴⁵ and such instruction need not embrace the theory of the other party,⁴⁶ since the latter can submit the theory in an instruction of his own.⁴⁷ The right of recovery should be confined to the specific cause of action alleged in the declaration.⁴⁸ Instructions are properly limited by the court to the count of the declaration or complaint to which they are applicable.⁴⁹

Common-law and statutory liability. Where the extent of the liability is governed by statute, the court should instruct the jury by construing the statute in its application to the case at bar.⁵⁰ Where the issues warrant recovery either at common law or under a statute, it has been held that it is not erroneous to instruct as to defendant's liability both at common law and under the statute,⁵¹ and in such cases it has been held erroneous to disregard the issue arising from the common-law liability.⁵²

Limiting purpose for which evidence may be considered. Where evidence competent for one purpose merely or as to one issue is admitted, the court instruction on the question be given, where it has already been fully covered in other instructions⁶³ It is not, however, error to refuse to charge on the burden of proof where there is no defect in plaintiff's proof and the issues are clearly submitted on the facts,⁶⁴ and, when the circumstances and facts of a case are proved by direct testimony, it is error to instruct the jury that it should consider and give proper weight to the instincts and presumptions which naturally lead men to avoid injury and preserve their own lives, in determining whether, at the time he was injured, plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care⁶⁵ Where plaintiff has pleaded negligence both generally and specially, he has been held to be entitled to an instruction on the res ipsa loquitur doctrine notwithstanding he proves specific acts of negligence,⁶⁶ but where the complaint alleges only specific acts of negligence such an instruction is improper⁶⁷ Where plaintiff's action is based on the theory that the injury was due to violation by the employer of statutes imposing an absolute duty on him, an instruction requiring plaintiff to prove the employer's negligence is not proper⁶⁸

§ 541. — What Law Governs

The jury must be instructed fully and properly as to the law relative to the liability of the master for injury to the servant where the injury occurred outside the state of the forum or where the applicability of federal or state laws is involved.

It is the duty of the court of the state in which an action has been brought for personal injuries, alleged to have occurred in another state, to instruct the jury fully as to any conflict in the laws of the two states relative to the liability of the master to his servant⁶⁹ So, where the doctrine of the fellow-servant rule is in issue and the law of the forum with respect thereto differs from the law of the lex loci delicti, it is error to fail to instruct with respect to the difference between the rules in the two jurisdictions⁷⁰ In such case the court should instruct the jury as to who is a fellow servant under the law of the state governing the case⁷¹

Federal or state law. In a proper case the court should instruct the jury with respect to the federal or state laws, depending on which is applicable⁷² If the federal statute is applicable it is sufficient to instruct in the language of the statute itself⁷³ Where the case is submitted on the issue of common-law liability for negligence, it is not erroneous to fail to define terms dealing with liability under federal statutes⁷⁴ Where there is an issue of fact as to whether the injury occurred while working under interstate or intra-state commerce, the court shall instruct the jury on the law as to both⁷⁵ If the liability of the master is the same under the state and federal statutes, it has been held not to be erroneous to fail to distinguish between the commerce in which the master is engaged as being either interstate or intra-state commerce⁷⁶

ries to the servant, where the relation of the parties is in issue the court should properly instruct the jury thereon; and, when the liability of more than one defendant is in issue, the court should properly instruct the jury on the law relating thereto.

Where the relation of the parties is in issue, the court should properly instruct the jury thereon⁷⁷ and it is error to refuse a proper request.⁷⁸ The instructions must not ignore the elements of the relation of master and servant⁷⁹ and must be supported by the evidence and the pleadings⁸⁰ Likewise, the instructions should not assume as a matter of law the existence of the relation when such fact is in controversy⁸¹

Codefendants. When the liability of more than one defendant is in issue, the court should properly instruct the jury on the law relating thereto⁸²

§ 543. — Scope of Employment

Where the issue is whether the injury occurred with in the scope of the servant's employment, the court should properly instruct the jury on the law relating to such issue

Where the issue is properly raised that the injury occurred outside the scope of the servant's employment,⁸³ the court should properly instruct the jury on the law relating to such issue,⁸⁴ as, for instance, where the application of the doctrine of assumption of risks depends on whether such doctrine applies to risks outside the scope of the employment.⁸⁵ It is proper to instruct the jury that the servant cannot recover, if the injury occurred while he was in the performance of an act outside of his duties, and that the scope of duty within which a servant is entitled to protection is to be defined by what he was employed to perform, and what, with the knowledge and approval of the employer, he did perform, rather than by the verbal designation of his position.⁸⁶

The jury should be given appropriate instructions relative to the cause of the injury, in conformity with the issues raised under the pleadings and evidence

Instructions should be given relating to the cause of the injury complained of⁸⁷ in conformity with the issues raising the question under the pleadings and evidence⁸⁸ The jury should be instructed as to

§ 546. — Negligence of Master

a. In general

- b. Restricting right of recovery, submitting various hypotheses on negligence
- c. Statutory liability

a. In General

Where negligence of the master is in issue, proper instructions thereon should be given which do not invade the province of the jury or impose a higher degree of care on the employer than is imposed on him by law.

When the issue of the master's negligence and degree of care required of him is properly raised by the pleadings and evidence⁴ the court should instruct the jury on the law of such issue,⁵ doing so in a proper manner⁶ and so framing the instructions that they are not open to objection as infringing on or invading the province of the jury as triers of the facts.⁷ An instruction which imposes on the master a higher duty or degree of care than is imposed by law is erroneous.⁸ Such instruction must be con-

An instruction advising the jury as to the duty owing plaintiff as to his safety is properly directed to the duty to him in particular, without regard to the safety of defendant's servants in general,¹⁰ and, while it is the better practice to state the qualifications of a master's liability to the employee in connection with a statement of the liability, the failure to do so, where such qualifications are referred to in connection with a statement of the liability, will not render the charge misleading.¹¹ In a proper case the court should instruct on the duty imposed by law on an employer of minor employees.¹² It is not error for the court to refuse a charge explaining the difference in the degree of care to be exercised by a common carrier toward a passenger and an employee.¹³

The instructions must be limited to the particular act or acts of negligence of the master relied on for recovery. In a proper case separate hypotheses of negligence may be submitted.

The instructions must be limited to the specified act or acts of negligence alleged, and restrict the right of recovery thereto³⁹ In a proper case the court may properly submit the case to the jury under two separate hypotheses of negligence⁴⁰ Under an allegation of general negligence the court may properly submit to the jury the particular act of negligence proved, since such action does not constitute submission of an issue not included within the complaint or petition,⁴¹ but under a general allegation of negligence it has been held improper to instruct on a breach of duty of the employer not connected with the doing of the act resulting in the injury⁴² Where separate grounds of negligence are charged, it is proper to submit them separately,⁴³ but the court should, by proper instructions, withdraw from the consideration of the jury a question of negligence on which the evidence is insufficient to go to the jury⁴⁴ Where the negligence of the master in having a defective place for work concurs with his negligence in furnishing incompetent fellow servants, both being separately alleged in the complaint or petition, the issue of negligence in having the defective place for work may be submitted without reference to the negligence in furnishing incompetent fellow servants⁴⁵ It is error to require judgment for defendant unless all the enumerated acts of negligence are found in favor of plaintiff⁴⁶

Where the liability of the master under statutory provisions is in issue, the jury should be properly instructed thereon.

Where issues, properly raised, involve a liability of the master under statutory provisions, the court should instruct the jury on such issues in a proper manner with reference to such statutory liability.⁴⁷ If, under the statute, negligence need not be shown, an instruction predicated liability on negligence is properly refused.⁴⁸ Any ground of negligence properly presented by the pleadings and evidence, whether under the common law or the statute law, should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions.⁴⁹ So, if the action is based on both statute and common-law negligence, the court should properly instruct the jury on both grounds.⁵⁰ Where the issues only raise the question of the master's liability at common law, it is erroneous to submit the case as one within the statute.⁵¹ Where a master is subject to the same liability at common law and under statute, a charge which refers to the statute is not erroneous and does not affect plaintiff's right of recovery on the common-law liability.⁵²

§ 547. — Contracts Affecting Liability

Where issues of fact with respect to the master's liability as affected by a contract between the parties are properly raised, the court should instruct the jury on the law relating thereto.

Where issues of fact with respect to the master's liability as affected by a contract between the parties are properly raised, the court should instruct the jury on the law relating thereto.⁵³ Where a statute prohibits waiver of its benefits by employees, an instruction susceptible of meaning that a proper settlement after injury cannot be made has been held to be erroneous.⁵⁴

The jury should be instructed on the law relating to the fellow-servant doctrine where such doctrine is involved in the issues raised.

When the fellow-servant doctrine is involved in the issues raised,⁵⁵ it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury on the law relating thereto, doing so in a proper manner.⁵⁶ Such instructions should be construed in connection with other instructions given, and if, taken together, they fairly and fully present the law, they are not objectionable.⁵⁷

More particularly, it is the duty of the court to lay down rules in its instructions defining the relation of fellow servants with substantial accuracy,⁵⁸ and to instruct the jury as to the liability of the master for the acts of a vice-principal or superior servant,⁵⁹ as to the distinction between a fellow servant's personal negligence and his negligence in a matter in which he stands in the place of the master,⁶⁰ and as to the liability or nonliability of the master for injuries proximately caused by the negligence of a fellow servant.⁶¹ Where applicable, the jury should also be instructed as to the effect of concurrent negligence on the part of the master and a fellow servant,⁶² and, in some jurisdictions, as to the duty of the master to exercise reasonable supervision over his servants.⁶³ In a case so requiring, the distinction between the negligence of a competent fellow servant and the unskillfulness of an incompetent fellow servant should be clearly pointed out to the jury.⁶⁴

§ 549. — Assumption of Risk and Contributory Negligence

- a Distinction between assumption of risk and contributory negligence
- b Assumption of risk
- c Contributory negligence

a. Distinction between Assumption of Risk and Contributory Negligence

Where the issues raised by the pleadings and evidence so require, the jury should be instructed as to the distinction between assumption of risk and contributory negligence, particularly where one or the other defense has been abrogated or restricted by statute.

Although, as discussed supra § 357, the defenses of contributory negligence and assumed risks are separate and distinct, it frequently happens that they are both available in the same case and under the same state of facts, and at common law, where under the evidence the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk approximate each other so closely as to become indistinguishable, it would not be error for the court to fail to draw the distinction between the two defenses.⁶⁵ However, ordinarily an instruction is erroneous which confounds the distinction between assumption of risk and contributory negligence,⁶⁶ and, where by force of statute one of these defenses has been abrogated or restricted and the other retains its character as a complete defense, it is important for the court, in its instructions, to draw the distinction which is made by the statute,⁶⁷ and so to frame its instructions, where the evidence warrants it, as to allow defendant the benefit of the defense available,⁶⁸ although the same evidence may justify an instruction on the defense not available under the statute.⁶⁹ A charge may be defective in attempting to couple contributory negligence and assumed risk together in such a way as to confuse the issue.⁷⁰ A correct charge on contributory negligence is not rendered bad because it fails to charge on assumption of risk.⁷¹

invading the province of the jury⁷⁵ Such instructions should be construed in connection with other instructions given, and, if all the instructions taken together properly state the law, they are not objectionable⁷⁶ The court should give proper instructions as to the servant's right to rely on the master's exercise of due care for his protection⁷⁷ It is not essential, in order to avoid misconception by the jury of the rule by which they are to be guided in determining the issue of assumed risk, that the charge be confined to a consideration of the specific act of negligence alleged⁷⁸

Concurrent negligence of master. An instruction on assumption of risk by a servant which ignores the question of concurrent negligence on the part of the master or of some one for whose negligence the master is responsible is erroneous.⁷⁹ Where the jury are instructed as to assumption of risk, an instruction on the master's duties is not erroneous for failure to mention the question of the servant's assumption of risk⁸⁰ Where there is no assumption of risk of injury from the master's negligence, an instruction on assumption of risk is properly refused where there is proof of negligence of the master⁸¹ An instruction that the servant does not assume risk if the master is negligent has been held to be improper where the evidence shows that the master's negligence was due to the servant's own negligence⁸²

plication of the doctrine of assumption of risk depends on the dangerous character of the operations and methods of work, the court should instruct the jury on the law relating thereto.⁸³ An instruction as to the effect of the choice by plaintiff of a dangerous method of doing his work, when other safer methods were open to him, is insufficient if it omits the essential element of his knowledge of such safer methods,⁸⁴ and it is proper to refuse to charge that if, among different modes of performing his duty, some of which were safe, plaintiff chose one which was less safe, he took the risk of his choice, since this is but a circumstance which the jury should consider with the other facts in determining whether or not plaintiff was at fault⁸⁵

Inexperienced or youthful servants. If an issue, properly raised, may call for the application of the doctrine of assumption of risk, invoked as against an inexperienced or youthful servant, the court should instruct the jury on the law relating thereto,⁸⁶ it is erroneous not to do so,⁸⁷ and requested instructions ignoring the doctrine are properly refused⁸⁸ The court, in giving such an instruction, should do so in a proper manner⁸⁹

Risks as to places of work, machinery, appliances, etc. The courts have considered and passed on the correctness or sufficiency of instructions relating to the assumption of risks as to places of work,⁹⁰ tools, machinery, and appliances,⁹¹ platforms, scaffolds,

(2) Statutory Modification of Doctrine

If the defense of assumption of risk has been modified by statute, the court should instruct the jury accordingly; and, if the defense has been abolished, no charge thereon need be given.

If the defense of assumption of risk has been modified by statute, the court should instruct accordingly,⁹⁷ and in such case an instruction under the common law may properly be refused.⁹⁸ A charge synonymous with, or substantially in, the language of the statute is sufficient.⁹⁹ If by force of statute assumption of risk is no defense, there is no necessity to charge thereon;¹ and an instruction injecting the doctrine into the case is erroneous,² but, if defendant pleads it, it has been held not to be erroneous to charge that assumption of risk is no defense³ without defining the term,⁴ and such an instruction has been held proper, although assumption of risk was not pleaded, where, under the evidence, the jury might find that the servant assumed the risk unless they were otherwise instructed.⁵ As discussed supra § 536, under some statutes assumption of risk is always a question of fact, while at common law it may be either a question of law or of fact, but, if on the evidence assumption of risk is a question of fact at common law, it is proper, whether the action is regarded as one at common law or under statute, to charge that assumption of risk is a question of fact.⁶

(3) Knowledge by Servant of Defect or Danger

Where the doctrine of assumption of risk is involved, the court should instruct the jury as to the effect of the servant's knowledge, actual or constructive, of the dangers incident to his employment.

Since the doctrine of assumption of risk is ordinarily dependent on the servant's knowledge, actual or constructive, of the dangers incident to his employment, the court should instruct the jury as to the assumption of the risk of any defect or danger of which the servant knows, or should, in the exercise of ordinary care, know,⁷ and must do so in a proper manner.⁸ Such an instruction must be sup-

fails to hypothesize negligence on his part³⁰ as the contributing cause of injury³¹ In order to entitle defendant to an instruction grouping the evidence on an issue of contributory negligence, the facts must have been specifically pleaded.³² One may be entitled to have a charge given, grouping the facts relied on as contributory negligence, although the plea may not have been as specific as the testimony³³

Acts in emergencies. Where the pleadings and evidence justify an instruction on the doctrine of emergency or sudden danger,³⁴ the court should instruct the jury on the law relating to such doctrine³⁵ It is proper to instruct the jury that a man under sudden excitement of peril is required to exercise only such care for his safety as an ordinarily prudent man would have exercised under the circumstances, and, if he exercised such degree of care, in that case he is not guilty of contributory negligence.³⁶ Such an instruction should, however, refer to the question as to whether the servant had time, after knowing his danger, to protect himself³⁷

Compliance with commands Where the issue is properly raised as to whether or not the servant was injured while acting in obedience to the order or command of his master or of one for whose negligence the master is responsible,³⁸ the court should correctly instruct the jury on the law relating thereto³⁹

Injury avoidable by care of master. Where there is evidence to justify an instruction on the doctrine of discovered peril,⁴⁰ the court should properly instruct the jury on the law relating thereto⁴¹ An instruction which in effect withdraws the issue of discovered peril raised by the evidence from the jury may properly be refused⁴²

Methods of work Where the issues properly raise the question whether or not plaintiff's injuries were caused by the method of work adopted by him,⁴³ the court should properly instruct the jury in the law relating thereto⁴⁴ In order to warrant an instruction that an employee selecting a dangerous method rather than a safe one apparent to him cannot recover, there must be a showing that the way chosen was dangerous and that a safer way was presently available.⁴⁵ The submission of the issue whether plaintiff selected a dangerous method in performing his work one way rather than another is not warranted where either way is safe in the absence of negligence⁴⁶

(2) Statutory Modification of Doctrine

Instructions on contributory negligence should recognize any statutory limitation on the doctrine of contributory negligence, and, where the defense has been abolished, requests for instructions submitting contributory negligence to the consideration of the jury are properly refused.

If by force of statute the doctrine of contributory negligence is limited, in a proper case it is necessary to instruct the jury accordingly, doing so in a proper manner,⁴⁷ and it has been held to be improper to instruct that an employee was contributorily negligent as a matter of law, where contributory negligence is not an absolute defense⁴⁸ If by force of statute contributory negligence is no defense, an instruction permitting recovery irrespective of the employee's negligence is proper,⁴⁹ and instructions on contributory negligence, requested by defendant, are properly refused,⁵⁰ and it has been held not to be erroneous to charge that contributory negligence is no defense⁵¹ without defining the term.⁵² On the other hand, under such circumstances, an instruction allowing the jury to find against plaintiff because of his contributory negligence is improper⁵³ Where the answer pleads that the servant's negligence was the direct and proximate cause of his injury, it has been held to be proper to admonish the jury that the defense is valid only if they find that the negligence of plaintiff was the sole cause⁵⁴

Defendant is entitled to complete instructions as to plaintiff's contributory negligence, where such negligence may be considered in mitigation of damages⁵⁵ In a number of cases the courts have passed on the correctness or sufficiency of instructions relating to the diminution of damages by reason of contributory negligence⁵⁶

Where in an action for injuries two counts are joined, one based on statutory liability, and the other on the common law, failure to give instructions as to contributory negligence at common law is proper, where the count based on the common law is abandoned and is not submitted to the jury.⁵⁷

(3) Inexperienced or Youthful Servants

Where the question is in issue, the jury should be instructed on the effect of youth or inexperience of the servant as affecting contributory negligence.

When the issues properly raise the question,⁵⁸ the court should instruct the jury on the question of contributory negligence by inexperienced or youthful servants, doing so in a proper manner.⁵⁹ The court should instruct the jury as to the degree of care required of such a servant.⁶⁰ The jury should be charged to consider the servant's experience, age, capacity, and appearance on the question of contributory negligence,⁶¹ and on the question of how much instruction and care he was entitled to,⁶² and it is not sufficient to charge generally on his duty to exercise reasonable care.⁶³ The court should instruct that plaintiff's minority did not relieve him from the duty of using the care to prevent injury to himself which one of his age and intelligence would use under similar circumstances.⁶⁴

(4) Duty to Discover or Remedy Defect

Where the issues properly raise the question, the jury should be instructed on the law relative to the duty of the servant to discover or remedy the defect or danger.

When the issues properly raise the question,⁶⁵ the court should properly instruct the jury as to the law relating to the duty of the servant to discover or remedy the defect or danger.⁶⁶ An instruction, which ignores the duty of the servant to inform himself of the surroundings and perils attendant on the nature of the service in which he was engaged at the time of his injury, and which were open to his observation in the exercise of reasonable care on his part, is erroneous,⁶⁷ and, where there is a distinct issue made as to whether it was the duty of plaintiff to inspect the machinery, appliances, or place of work, the court should charge that, if such duty rested on him, he cannot recover for any defects which he might have discovered by inspection.⁶⁸ Also, where there is evidence to show that it was the servant's duty to see that the appliances or place of work were kept in a reasonably safe condition, the court should give a proper instruction presenting the subject of his duty to the jury.⁶⁹

(5) Disobedience of Rules and Orders

The jury should, in a proper case, be instructed as to the effect of the servant's violation of rules or orders, and as to the effect of the employer's acquiescence in such violation.

Where there is evidence to justify an instruction thereon,⁷⁰ the court should instruct the jury as to the effect of a servant's violation of a rule or order or warning,⁷¹ and as to the effect of acquiescence in such violation on the part of the master or his representative.⁷² An instruction which ignores the element of the servant's knowledge of a rule,⁷³ which excludes the effect of contributory negligence in defeating a recovery,⁷⁴ or which ignores precautions shown to have been taken by the servant to comply with the rule he is charged with having violated,⁷⁵ or which ignores testimony relative to a general disregard of the rules by the employees,⁷⁶ is erroneous. Where the evidence warrants it, it is proper to instruct that, if plaintiff violated a rule of defendant, and his injuries were the result thereof, he will not be debarred from recovery, if under the circumstances a reasonably prudent person would have done as he did.⁷⁷ Instructions as to participation by plaintiff in the violation of a rule have been held properly refused where the evidence shows that plaintiff was a subordinate employee and did not participate in such violation.⁷⁸

§ 550. Verdict and Findings

- a In general
- b Sufficiency of findings
- c Consistency of findings

a. In General

The rules relative to verdicts and findings in civil actions generally apply in actions by a servant against his master for personal injuries.

The rules as to the verdict or findings in civil actions generally discussed in the C.J.S. title Trial §§ 485-573, also 64 C.J. p 1053 note 52 et seq, apply in actions by a servant against his master for personal injuries,⁷⁹ including those relating to special verdicts,⁸⁰ requests for special findings,⁸¹ and preparation and form of interrogatories.⁸² A verdict by less than the total number of jurors in a jurisdiction where such a verdict is permitted in an action by a servant against his master for an injury caused by the master's negligence⁸³ is not invalid because the action is brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.⁸⁴ Where by statute the court on request must direct the jury to return a special verdict on any or all of the issues, a failure by the jury to make the proper findings on the issues submitted requires a reversal.⁸⁵

It has been held preferable that the jury return special verdicts relative to reduction of damages by contributory negligence in actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.⁸⁶

Construction and operation. The general rules governing the construction and operation of verdicts and findings in civil actions apply to actions by a servant against his master to recover for personal injuries.⁸⁷ A general verdict, if it is supported by the evidence,⁸⁸ must be construed as establishing every material fact in issue⁸⁹ necessary to support it,⁹⁰ except such facts as are eliminated by instructions⁹¹ or special findings⁹²

Where a general verdict is accompanied by special findings, all parts of the verdict⁹³ are to be reconciled in support thereof if it can reasonably be done⁹⁴ No presumptions will be indulged in favor of special findings as against a general verdict,⁹⁵ but, on the other hand, every reasonable intendment in favor of the general verdict should be made⁹⁶ In determining the force of the answers to interrogatories, nothing but the pleadings, the verdict, and answers can be considered.⁹⁷ It is the duty of the court to reconcile special findings one with another if it can reasonably be done⁹⁸ A finding of no evidence on a matter essential to recovery⁹⁹ requires no construction¹ and is fatal to a recovery.² Where the jury in answer to special questions finds that the negligence on which they base their verdict is a single act, the finding acquits defendant of all other charges of negligence alleged in the petition or mentioned in the evidence³

b. Sufficiency of Findings

In an action against a master to recover for injuries to his servant, findings must be definite and certain and supported by the evidence, and must be responsive to the issues and instructions.

In an action against a master to recover for personal injuries to his servant the findings to be sufficient must be definite and certain,⁴ and supported by the evidence⁵ A special verdict should be sufficiently certain to stand as a final decision of the special matters with which it deals⁶ Special findings must find ultimate,⁷ and not evidentiary,⁸ facts or conclusions of law⁹

tions¹¹ A finding on an immaterial issue may be disregarded¹²

c. Consistency of Findings

In an action against a master to recover for injuries to his servant, special findings on a material issue which are absolutely irreconcilable with the general verdict will control the general verdict

In accordance with the rules applicable to civil actions generally with relation to the consistency of findings, whether findings are inconsistent will depend on the issues raised by the pleadings and the findings thereon.¹³ Special findings are inconsistent with the general verdict when they, as matter of law, authorize a judgment different from that authorized by the verdict.¹⁴ Special findings on a material issue¹⁵ that are so inconsistent with the general verdict as to be absolutely irreconcilable with it,¹⁶ beyond the possibility of such conflict being removed by any supposable or conceivable evidence legitimately admissible under the issues,¹⁷ will control the general verdict¹⁸ Special findings which are inconsistent one with another¹⁹ neutralize each other²⁰ and cannot control a general verdict²¹ if the other special findings are not in conflict with it.²² Special findings are not inconsistent where one is necessarily included as an element of the other.²³

5. NEW TRIAL, JUDGMENT, REVIEW, AND DAMAGES

§ 551. New Trial

In actions against a master to recover for personal injuries to his servant, a new trial may be granted or refused in accordance with the general rules governing new trials in civil actions.

The usual rules are applicable to questions relating to a new trial of an action against a master for personal injuries to his servant²⁴ Under these rules a new trial should be granted where the verdict is manifestly contrary to, or against the weight of, the evidence,²⁵ and this rule has been expressly enacted by some statutes²⁶ Where the essential findings required for the court to enter judgment are in such conflict that one destroys the other, the court should order a new trial.²⁷

In actions against an employer for injuries to his servant, the judgment must conform to the pleadings and proof and be consistent with, and supported by, the verdict or findings.

In actions against an employer for injuries to his servant the judgment, as in civil actions generally, must be in conformity to the pleadings and the proof,²⁸ and be in accordance with, and sustained by, the verdict or findings.²⁹ Where the jury finds the facts on controlling issues, and there is no contradictory finding, the court should enter judgment in conformity with the findings,³⁰ and, where under the findings the servant is not entitled to any recovery, a finding that if he were entitled to recover his damages would be in a certain amount does not warrant a judgment in his favor for that amount.³¹

In jurisdictions where a special verdict must find on all of the facts in issue which are essential to a judgment, a judgment for plaintiff cannot be sustained by findings which do not determine, if the fact is in issue, whether there is actionable negligence,³² in what it consisted,³³ whether it was the proximate cause of the injury,³⁴ and whether the servant was guilty of contributory negligence.³⁵

Special findings which are irreconcilably inconsistent³⁶ in matters material to the issues involved³⁷ will not afford a sufficient basis for a judgment.

§ 553. Appeal and Error

The rules as to appeal and error in civil actions are discussed in Appeal and Error.

§ 554. Damages

- a. In general
- b. Exemplary damages

a. In General

Except as modified by statute, in actions against a master to recover for injuries to his servant, the recovery of compensatory damages is controlled by the general rules governing the elements and measure of damages in personal injury cases.

The general rules governing the elements and measure of compensatory damages are applicable to actions against the master for injury to, or death of, a servant in the absence of special statutory regulation.³⁸ In some jurisdictions, and under some employers' liability acts, where the master is only concurrently negligent the negligence of the servant³⁹ or of a fellow servant⁴⁰ will be considered in mitigation of damages. Thus under Federal Employers' Liability Act § 3, 45 U.S.C.A. § 53, contributory negligence of the servant will reduce the amount of damages in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to him,⁴¹ and if contributory negligence has been shown, but the jury makes no deduction, the court may order such remittitur as seems proper.⁴² Ordinarily the fellow-servant rule operates to defeat the right of recovery rather than to limit the amount of damages recoverable.⁴³

Minors. Under some statutes the fact that a minor servant unlawfully employed misrepresented his age may not be considered in mitigation of damages.⁴⁴ Where double damages are recoverable if the servant was employed in violation of a child labor law, employment in violation of such law must be established before such damages may be recovered⁴⁵

The right of a servant to recover exemplary damages generally depends on whether his injury was the result of willful, wanton, or gross negligence of the master or one for whose acts the master is liable

As a general rule, exemplary or punitive damages

may not be awarded for injuries to a servant unless the master's negligence was willful, wanton, or gross,⁴⁶ although gross or wanton negligence may authorize recovery of such damages⁴⁷ In some jurisdictions the master is not liable in exemplary damages for gross negligence of its employees unless such employee was a vice principal rather than a fellow servant⁴⁸ or unless he was engaged in a nondelegable or absolute duty of the master⁴⁹

Ratification of servant's acts Retention in service of an employee with knowledge of his assault on plaintiff employee has been held not to be such a ratification of the assault as to render the employer liable in exemplary damages⁵⁰

V. LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO THIRD PERSONS

A. ACTS OR OMISSIONS OF SERVANT

§ 555. In General

a. General rules

b. Employers' liability act

a. General Rules

The liability of the master for his servant's wrongful acts has been based on the ground that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer for the wrong of a third, the loss must fall on him who has enabled the third person to do the wrong, or on the doctrine of agency, or, more specifically, on the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se, or on the doctrine of respondent superior.

It has been broadly stated that when the relation of master and servant exists the master is liable in damages to any third person suffering injuries from the tortious or negligent act of his servant⁵¹ The liability of the master for his servant's wrongful acts has been based on the ground that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer for the wrong of a third, the loss must fall on him who has enabled the third person to do the wrong,⁵² or on the doctrine of agency,⁵³ or, more specifically on the maxi-

im, Qui facit per alium facit per se,⁵⁴ or on the doctrine of respondeat superior, discussed infra § 561 et seq. It has been said that one is responsible for another's acts only when the relation of master and servant,⁵⁵ or the relation of master and servant or principal and agent,⁵⁶ exists between them

In general the master is not liable where the employee himself would not be liable if he had acted in his own behalf instead of as a servant,⁵⁷ or as discussed infra § 570, where the master would not have been liable if he himself, instead of the servant, had committed the act, or where the act of the employee does not proximately cause the injury complained of.⁵⁸ When it appears that an employee was not acting in the course of his employment, a reasonable connection at least must be shown between the employer and the act of his employee which caused damage, before any liability therefor attaches to the employer.⁵⁹

The fact that an employee's wages are paid by one other than his employer does not exempt the latter from liability for his employee's acts,⁶⁰ nor is an employer relieved from liability for such acts by the fact that the injured person may be aided in the enforcement of a judgment by an execution against the person.⁶¹ The statutory liability of a servant does not preclude the common-law liability of his master.⁶² An employer cannot claim immunity from liability for damages done to a third person by his employee because the law with respect to the employment has not been complied with.⁶³

"Servant" not restricted to domestic servant The word "servant," as used in a statute making every person liable for torts committed by his servant by his command or in the prosecution and within the scope of his business, means an employee, and is not limited to domestic servants.⁶⁴

Under the provisions of an employers' liability act liability is imposed on an employer for injury to another's employee acting within the scope of his employment.

The provisions of an employers' liability act have been held designed to protect employees⁶⁵ and to impose liability on an employer for injury to another's employee⁶⁶. An action will lie thereunder for damages only at the instance of one who is an employee carrying on his work at the place where he is injured⁶⁷ and who was acting within the scope of his employment,⁶⁸ the purpose was not to give a mere member of the public, as such, a right of action,⁶⁹ the word "public," as used in the act, relating only to criminal liability thereunder⁷⁰.

§ 556. Liability of Master Based on His Contribution or Participation

failure to exercise ordinary care in furnishing a reasonably safe tool or appliance.

Since a master has the right to choose the instrumentalities or agencies for the performance of the work or duties required of employees,⁷¹ he may become liable to a third person for his failure to exercise ordinary care in choosing and furnishing a reasonably safe tool or appliance.⁷² An employer's duty to guard the public from the danger flowing from the use of his property by employees acting outside the scope of their employment is limited to the exercise of skill and care commensurate with the danger which may reasonably be anticipated⁷³.

§ 557. — Acts Done by Express Command or Assent

A master is liable for torts committed by his servant in obedience to his express orders, or committed in his presence with his assent or acquiescence.

Opportunity to guard

While such duty cannot be delegated, it is measured by opportunity afforded, under particular conditions, to prevent injury after knowledge or notice of danger is brought home to employer, and where danger cannot reasonably be anticipated, there is no duty to guard against it, and after knowledge or notice of danger is present, there must be reasonable opportunity to guard against it.—Ford v. Grand Union Co, supra.

A master is liable for the tort of his servant where the tortious act is done in obedience to his express orders or directions,⁷⁴ even though the service is not within the line of the servant's usual duties,⁷⁵ and provided the injury to the third person occurs as the natural, direct, and proximate result of the directed or authorized act.⁷⁶ So also the master is liable for a tortious act of his servant committed in his presence with his assent or acquiescence,⁷⁷ or where the unauthorized act of a servant is performed with the knowledge and apparent approval of those authorized to represent the master⁷⁸ by reason of the master's knowledge of, and acquiescence in, previous acts of the servant of a similar character, although the acts were not within the scope of the servant's employment.⁷⁹ Nevertheless, in order to charge the master with liability for unauthorized acts of the servant, it must be shown that he had either actual notice of such acts or that they were committed so frequently and under such circumstances as to justify the presumption of notice.⁸⁰

§ 558. — Ratification by Master

A master not otherwise liable for his servant's wrongful act may so ratify it as to become liable therefor; but ratification can be inferred only from acts unequivocally evincing the intention to ratify.

A wrongful act committed by a servant, resulting in injury to a third person, for which the master ordinarily would not be liable, may be so ratified by him as to fix liability on him for the injury,⁸¹ in which circumstances the wrong may be fairly said to be that of the master himself.⁸² There can, of course, be no ratification unless the act was done for the master⁸³ or at least purported to be done for him.⁸⁴

The ratification must be with full knowledge of the act or fact to be ratified,⁸⁵ of the tortious character of the act,⁸⁶ or of the surrounding circumstances.⁸⁷ Ratification is a question of intention⁸⁸ and can be inferred only from acts which evince clearly and unequivocally the intention to ratify, and not from acts which may be readily and satisfactorily explained without involving such intention.⁸⁹ The mere retention in employment of the servant who has been guilty of the wrongful act complained of does not amount to a ratification of his act so as to impose liability on the master⁹⁰ even though the master has knowledge of the servant's wrongful act,⁹¹ but it has been held that retention in employment amounts to some evidence of ratification or may be considered as bearing thereon.⁹²

On the other hand, if the master with knowledge of the wrongful act accepts the benefits thereof, there is a ratification which renders him liable.⁹³

The master, in selecting an employee, must exercise a degree of care commensurate with the nature and danger of the business in which he is engaged and the nature and grade of service for which the servant is intended,⁹⁹ but is required to hire employees possessing only such skill as is ordinarily and reasonably commensurate with the work to be

§ 560. — Failure to Instruct Servant or to Enforce Obedience to Instructions

A master is liable for injuries resulting to third persons from his failure to instruct his servants as to the method of performing their work or to see that they obey his instructions.

Negligence of the master in failing properly to instruct his servants as to the method of performance of the work which they are employed to do renders him liable for injuries to third persons resulting therefrom,⁷ as does his failure to see that his instructions are obeyed.⁸ He is responsible for injuries caused by a negligent failure to inform his servant of dangers incident to the business to which third persons are exposed, which are known to him and unknown to the servant.⁹ Negligence of the master, however, cannot be predicated on his failure to instruct his servant in the law of the land.¹⁰

§ 561. Liability of Master Based on Doctrine of Respondeat Superior

The doctrine of respondeat superior usually is relied on as the basis of liability of a master for injuries to third persons caused by the acts or omissions of his servants

The doctrine of respondeat superior usually is relied on as the basis of liability of a master for injuries to third persons caused by the acts or omissions of his servants.¹¹ The doctrine has been said to apply to one who is having a service rendered in his behalf only when the service is in itself unlawful or the manner of the execution of the service is unlawful and is within the control of the master.¹² The doctrine is not affected by the injured person's inability to sue the servant,¹³ nor does it depend on the master's right to sue the servant.¹⁴

§ 562. — Necessity for Relation of Master and Servant

Ordinarily, in order to render a person liable for injuries under the doctrine of respondeat superior, the relation of master and servant must be shown to have existed, between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged with the result of the wrong, at the time of the injury, and in respect of the very transaction out of which the injury arose.

Apart from statutory regulations, in order to render a person liable for injuries under the doctrine of respondeat superior, the relation of master and servant must be shown to have existed, between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged with the result of the wrong, at the time of the injury, and in respect of the very transaction out of which the injury arose.¹⁵ However, if this relation is

Whether the relation of master and servant, as fixing liability on one person for the acts of another under the doctrine of respondeat superior, exists in a particular case depends on the facts and circumstances of that case.

Whether the relation of master and servant exists in a particular case must depend on its own surrounding facts and circumstances,¹⁷ including the contract between the parties,¹⁸ and no one feature of the relation between them is determinative, but all must be considered together.¹⁹ The relation of master and servant, as fixing liability on one person for the acts of another under the doctrine of respondeat superior, is usually understood to arise when one person subordinately serves another, both consenting thereto,²⁰ and the relation may exist outside of actual working time.²¹ However, the existence of definite hours of labor has been declared a requisite of the existence of the relation.²²

ice is temporary or permanent²³ or on who owns the appliances that are being used;²⁴ and the relation may exist even though the law requires the selection of persons for the particular work to be made from a limited class.²⁵ Actual presence of one person with another is not necessary for the creation or maintenance between them of the relationship of master and servant²⁶

Unlawfulness of employment. While it has been held that, in order to render an employer liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior, the employment must have for its object the prosecution of a lawful business, and that if the business is unlawful or criminal, the relation of master and servant cannot exist,²⁷ this rule must be distinguished from the master's liability for the criminal acts of his servant committed within the scope of his employment where the relation of master and servant can and does exist, as discussed infra § 573.

b. Right to Select, Control, or Discharge Servant

In order that the relation of master and servant may exist for the purpose of fixing liability under the doctrine of respondeat superior, the alleged master must have the right to select, direct, control, and discharge the alleged servant.

In order to constitute the relation of master and servant for the purpose of fixing liability on the former for acts of the latter under the doctrine of respondeat superior, it is indispensable that the right to select the person claimed to be a servant should exist²⁸ Furthermore, something more than the mere right of selection is essential to the relation,²⁹ this right must be accompanied by the power or right to direct and control the alleged servant while in the alleged master's employ,³⁰ with respect to the employer's right to control exists so as to give rise to relationship of employer and employee is to determine whether, if instructions were given, they would have to be obeyed, fact that alleged employee chooses his own time to go out and return and is not directed where to go or to whom to sell, is not conclusive of relationship with employer and is not inconsistent with relationship of employer and employee—Burling-

Fact that oil company required op-

sults were to be accomplished—Tex-

employed is in the exercise of an independent and distinct employment, and not under the immediate control, direction, or supervision of the employer, the latter is not responsible for the acts of the former.³⁷

The control essential to the relation is authoritative control, as distinguished from mere suggestion or coöperation as to detail,³⁸ it is complete and unqualified control, or right to control,³⁹ and must extend not only to the ordering of the work to be done, or the result to be accomplished, but also to the mode, manner, and details of performance,⁴⁰ and must include the power to stop the work or to continue it.⁴¹ However, the actual exercise of control is not essential to the relation as long as the right to exercise control is present.⁴²

Failure to supervise does not change the relationship of employer and employee where the work is not

Right to discharge or cease work. It is also essential to the relation of master and servant that the right to discharge or remove for unskillfulness, neglect of duty, or other cause should exist,⁴³ the presence or absence of such right is of much importance,⁴⁴ and perhaps the most conclusive single circumstance⁴⁵ in determining whether the relation exists.

c. Contract of Employment

With respect to the liability of a master for the acts of a servant, the relation of master and servant may arise by implication as well as expressly; there need be no express contract of employment.

While the relation of master and servant arises out of contract,⁴⁶ and the assent of both parties is essential,⁴⁷ in order to constitute the relationship of master and servant, in so far as the liability of the former for the acts of the latter is concerned, there need be no express contract of employment,⁴⁸ the relation may arise by implication as well as expressly,⁴⁹ and the relation of the parties does not depend solely on the written contract.⁵⁰ If one knowingly and without objection receives the benefits of labor, or holds out to the public one as engaged in his service, he is liable as a master for the acts of the latter as his servant,⁵¹

even though the servant was, at the time of the negligence complained of, in the general employment of another,⁵² but it is not to be understood that a person can be rendered liable for injuries caused by the negligent act of a mere volunteer who, without the knowledge or assent of the former, undertook to perform services in his behalf.⁵³

Nature of contract of service. If one is injured by the servant of another, and the injury is in any manner connected with the fact of service, the particulars of the arrangement, or the terms of the agreement, are immaterial.⁵⁴ Thus it is immaterial to the injured party what the contract of service was, how long it was to continue, what compensation was to be paid for it, or what mutual covenants the parties had for their own protection.⁵⁵

d. Payment for Services

In determining the existence of the relation of master and servant, as rendering one person liable for another's acts, the fact or absence of payment by one to the other for services is not conclusive.

While the fact that men employed were paid by a certain person for their services might, in the absence of evidence negating the relation of master and servant, be accepted as some evidence of employment by him, it is not the determining test⁵⁶ and does not necessarily establish the existence of the relation.⁵⁷ On the other hand, in order to constitute the relation of master and servant, it is not essential that the person employed should receive a stated wage⁵⁸ or that the services should be paid for at all by the employer.⁵⁹

of a character requiring a great deal of supervision

It is generally of no importance in what payment is made, and hence it is not essential that the services should be paid for in money.⁶⁰ It has been held, however, that whether work is paid for by the day or by the job is a matter that may be considered in determining whether the relation is that of master and servant or of employer and employee.⁶¹

b. Absence of authorization or ratification by master

a. In General

A master is liable for acts done, by one whom the servant employs, with express or implied authority from the master, or with the master's acquiescence or ratification, to assist the servant in the master's work.

While ordinarily a subordinate servant has no power to employ or discharge assistants, so as to render the master liable for their acts,⁶² and, likewise, a servant cannot, without authority, abandon the master's service and substitute another person in his place so as to make the master responsible for the acts of the substituted servant,⁶³ a master is liable for the acts of one whom the servant employs, under authority given him by the master, to assist in the performance of the master's work.⁶⁴ The authority to employ assistants may be either express⁶⁵

The emergency-employment doctrine cannot be invoked merely to avoid an inconvenience, it is based on a sudden and unexpected incident which renders it necessary to obtain assistance, and without which the emergency condition cannot be overcome by the servant or any coemployees in the regular service of the master—Hall v O C Whitaker Co., 185 S W 2d 720, 143 Tex. 397

plied when he knows of such hiring and acquiesces in it.⁷⁵

Ratification. A master may also become liable for the acts of an assistant employed by the servant where he ratifies such employment.⁷⁶

Liability of servant. If the employment was authorized, the employing servant is not liable for the acts of the servant so employed.⁷⁷

b. Absence of Authorization or Ratification by Master

Since a person employed by a servant to assist him, without authorization from, or ratification by, the master, is not the latter's servant, the master is not liable for that person's acts under the doctrine of respondeat superior, but the master may be liable on other grounds and theories.

Where there is neither express nor implied authority given a servant to employ another to perform or to assist him in the performance of his work, or a subsequent ratification by his employer of such employment, the relation of master and servant between the employer and one so employed by his servant does not exist and he is not liable for the negligent acts of the latter under the doctrine of respondeat superior.⁷⁸

Liability of master on other grounds. While some decisions hold, apparently without qualification, that no liability attaches to the master on any ground by reason of acts of one employed by a servant where such employment was neither authorized nor ratified,⁷⁹ the weight of authority holds that the fact that the master cannot be held liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior does not necessarily absolve him from liability on other grounds,⁸⁰ although the decisions are not in accord as to the circumstances which will impose liability,⁸¹ or as to the juridical theory on which that liability should be explained.⁸² Some decisions hold the master liable where the act causing the injury was done in his presence and by his direction or with his assent and acquiescence, on the ground that the act is in effect that of the master himself,⁸³ and, according to some decisions, the master is not liable for the acts of a stranger where the servant, without authority so to do, delegates a particular duty to such stranger, and is not present and does not in any manner co-operate with the latter in the performance thereof.⁸⁴ Other decisions have formulated an even broader rule and have held that the negligence of a third person employed by a servant to do the work which the master employed the servant to do is the negligence of the servant and that the master is liable for resulting injuries,⁸⁵ or have affirmed the liability of the master on the ground that the injury was caused by an instrumentality used by the servant in the prosecution of the master's business, thereby making the act complained of the act of the servant himself, without reference to whether the act causing the injury was or was not done in the presence of the servant.⁸⁶

Participation in wrongful act by servant. Where the facts show combined or commingled acts of negligence on the part of the servant and one whom, without authority, he has employed to assist him in performing the master's work,⁸⁷ or where the facts are such that the servant can be said to be a party to, or to have participated in, the negligent act of the one so employed by him,⁸⁸ the master is liable for an injury resulting from the negligent act, and his responsibility is based on the negligence of his servant.⁸⁹

The statute providing for the appointment of special policemen for railroads, and authorizing such policemen to exercise in the counties, etc., in which the railroads are situated all the authority and powers held by constables, etc., does not make the corporation applying for the appointment liable for everything such policemen may do, regardless of whether it be for the protection of its property or the preservation of peace and good order on its premises—Philadelphia, B & W. R. Co. v. Stumpo, 77 A. 266, 112 Md 571.

performed in carrying out his duty as a public officer,⁹¹ or was committed in furtherance of some personal purpose to the special officer.⁹³ However, where such officer is acting in performance of the duties for which he is employed, such as the protection of property, the employer may be liable for his acts,⁹³ although the act resulting in the injury is a misjudged and wrongful act,⁹⁴ or in excess of his authority.⁹⁵ The employer will be liable where the movements of the special officer are directed by him.⁹⁶

Whether the acts complained of are inflicted by one in his capacity as a servant or as an officer is to be determined by all the circumstances in evidence.⁹⁷ Any irregularity in the original appointment of the officer is unimportant in determining whether or not there is liability on the ground that

§ 566. — Servants Hired or Lent to or under Control of Third Person

- a. In general
- b. Payment and right to discharge
- c. Driver and team hired to third person

a. In General

Where a servant is loaned by the employer to another, the question whether the general or the special employer is liable for his acts while in the special employment generally depends on which one retains the right of direction and control over him and in whose business the servant was engaged while performing the act complained of; in some circumstances both masters may be liable.

The Corpus Juris statement, which has been characterized as clear and concise, is that a servant may

It is not so much the actual exercise of control which is decisive as the right to exercise such control.⁶ In order to escape liability, the original master must resign full control of the servant for the time being, it not being sufficient that the servant is partially under the control of a third person;⁷ and it is necessary to distinguish between authoritative direction and control and mere suggestions as to details or the necessary co-operation where the work furnished is part of a larger operation.⁸ A servant of one employer does not become the servant of another for whom the work is performed merely because the latter points out to the servant the work to be done,⁹ or supervises the performance there-

The test in determining whether an employee is to be deemed employee of the person for whom the work is done, or of person from whom wages and orders and other matters incident to general employment are received, is that one is the employee of the person who has the right to control both the result of the work and the progress and details of the work and the manner in which it is to be performed

Another test in determining who the master is in such cases is the question as to whose business the servant was engaged in while performing the act complained of,¹⁷ and this question is usually determined by ascertaining under whose authority and command the work was being done,¹⁸ and, where the servant is at the time of the injury actually engaged in performing services for the original master, the latter is liable.¹⁹ It has been held that neither this test nor the control test furnishes an infallible rule,²⁰ that each case must be determined in the light of the existing facts and circumstances,²¹ that they should be considered as factors in reaching a conclusion as to where the responsibility lies, rather than as tests,²² and that frequently it is necessary to consider both rules in determining on whom the liability shall rest where there is a special, as well as a general, employer.²³ A further test in determining who is the master is whether the act of the borrowed servant which caused the damage was within the normal scope of the business of the borrower.²⁴ The fact that the borrowing employer carries no workmen's compensation insurance on the borrowed employee does not relieve him of liability for the latter's acts.²⁵ Likewise, the character of the service to be rendered²⁶ and the duration of the special employment²⁷ are to be considered as aids in determining the relation, although they do not necessarily determine it.

Use of machine or appliance. The fact that an employee is using the general employer's machine or appliance has been held to indicate a continuation of the general employment,²⁸ particularly if the machine or appliance is of considerable value,²⁹ but the test of liability is the possession of control over the operator,³⁰ and, where the hirer of a machine or appliance and operator has complete control, the hirer is liable for the operator's negligence, notwithstanding he remains a general servant of the owner of the machine or appliance.³¹

Lender and borrower both liable. Under some circumstances both the lender and the borrower may have control over the servant so as to render each of them liable for his conduct,³² for he may have been transferred to carry on work which is of mutual interest to them and to effect their common purpose, so that his service to the one does not involve abandonment of his service to the other.³³

Work primarily beneficial to another. One of the essentials to be considered in determining whether the general employment of one doing work primarily beneficial to another continues is the agreement or understanding between the general employer and the person primarily benefited.³⁴ Evidence that a person committing a tort is an employee of another, in his pay, employed by and subject to removal by him, and working under his control and supervision, negatives the relation of master and servant between the tort-feasor and the person for whose ultimate benefit the work is being done.³⁵

Direction by governmental borrower. Where a servant acts under the directions of municipal officers, the master is not liable,³⁶ the governmental immunity of the borrower of a servant does not subject the lender to liability.³⁷

Negligence in furnishing incompetent servant. The doctrine of loaned servant relieves the general master from liability for the servant's negligence only, and does not relieve the general master from liability for his own negligence in knowingly furnishing an incompetent servant.³⁸

b. Payment and Right to Discharge

The authorities differ as to whether, as between the general and the special employer, the one who pays a loaned servant or has the right to discharge him is necessarily the one liable for his acts.

Where control is surrendered by the general employer to the special employer, the latter is liable, under some authorities, even though the servant is paid by the original employer³⁹ and remains subject to discharge by him,⁴⁰ but it has been held that the right of the general employer to discharge the servant or substitute another for him indicates a continuation of the general employment,⁴¹ and that one who hires the servant of another cannot be said to have control over him so as to be responsible for his acts unless he has the right to discharge him and employ others in his place in case of his misconduct or incapacity.⁴² Other authority holds that neither the circumstance of who pays the servant for his service⁴³ nor the power to select and discharge the employee⁴⁴ is necessarily a controlling or determinative factor in all cases, although each is an element to be considered along with other factors in determining the relation or in deciding who had the right and power of control over the employee.⁴⁵

c. Driver and Team Hired to Third Person

Where an employer furnishes a driver and team to another, liability for the driver's acts, as between the general employer and the hirer, depends on which one has control of the driver's movements.

One who furnishes a driver and team to another for the latter's use for a particular purpose is nevertheless liable for injuries from the acts of the servant while performing such services for the third person, provided exclusive control of the driver is not vested in the hirer.⁴⁶ The test of liability turns on the question whether the employer or the hirer controls the movements of the driver.⁴⁷ Liability of the general employer for the acts of the driver furnished with the team is not affected by the fact that directions are given the driver by the hirer as to when and where to go,⁴⁸ that directions are given as to what shall be carried,⁴⁹ or that directions are given to the driver to hurry or to take his time,⁵⁰ or that the driver also assisted in the work that the hirer was doing for which the team was used,⁵¹ or that the hirer furnished a uniform for the driver.⁵² Also, liability of the general employer is not affected by the fact that the person doing the hiring expressly asked for the services of the particular driver whose act caused the injury,⁵³ or that the general employer furnishes the services of the driver and team without charge.⁵⁴

The hiring or lending of a motor vehicle and driver to a third person is discussed in the C.J.S. title Motor Vehicles § 436, also 42 C.J. p 1097 note 60—p 1099 note 71.

Care in choosing servant. The fact that due care was used in order to employ a careful and competent servant does not affect the liability of the general employer.⁵⁵

Driver under exclusive control of hirer. Where the driver is actually placed under the exclusive control of the hirer, the master is not liable, but the hirer is liable, for injuries resulting from the acts of the driver.⁵⁶

Use by hirer for unauthorized purpose. If a hired vehicle is used for a purpose different from that stipulated in the contract, the driver is not the agent of the owner in using it at the direction of the hirer.⁵⁷

§ 567. — Joint Employment

Several masters jointly employing a servant are jointly and severally liable for wrongful acts committed by him while acting within the scope of his employment and in behalf of all.

Where a servant is jointly employed by several masters, they are jointly and severally liable for his wrongful act toward third parties committed while acting within the scope of his employment and in behalf of all.⁵⁸ So, also, while there is some authority to the contrary,⁵⁹ it has generally been held that a joint and several liability attaches for the wrongful act of the joint servant, although at the time of the injury complained of he was engaged in performing a service for one of the masters only.⁶⁰ It has been held that the liability of a joint employer is not affected by the fact that the servant is paid by another of the employers.⁶¹

§ 568. — Termination of Relation

§ 569. — Persons to Whom Master Liable

A master may be liable for injuries inflicted by his servant on a licensee or invitee. Authorities differ as to whether an employee's wife or child, injured by his act, may assert the liability of his employer for such act.

A master has been held liable for injuries negligently inflicted by his servant on one who is neither a trespasser nor volunteer, but engaged in work, or otherwise acting, in such manner as to constitute him a licensee or invitee with an interest

entitling him to the exercise of ordinary care from the servants of the master;⁶⁸ and it has been held that, where a person has been invited to submit his person, comfort, and safety to the keeping of a master and his servants, the master has a special duty to protect the invitee.⁶⁹

A master's liability to a fellow servant of the one whose act was the cause of the injury, or to volunteers or others assisting the servant, is discussed supra §§ 321-355, his liability for injuries to the servant of an independent contractor in his employ caused by the negligence of himself or his servants, infra §§ 600-606

b. "Scope of Employment" and Similar Terms

The terms "scope of employment," "scope of authority," "course of employment," and similar terms are often used indiscriminately and interchangeably, and, while these terms have been said to have no fixed legal meaning, they are to be accepted in their ordinary sense.

The terms "scope of employment," "scope of authority," and "course of employment" are often used indiscriminately and interchangeably,⁸⁰ although technically there is a distinction.⁸¹ While these terms may have no fixed legal or technical meaning,⁸² and indeed have been said not to be susceptible of accurate definition,⁸³ they are to be accepted in their ordinary sense.⁸⁴ These terms, when used relative to the acts of a servant, are not synonymous with "during the period covered by his employment,"⁸⁵ but meanwhile engaged in the service of the master or while about his business,⁸⁶ and nothing more.⁸⁷

Other expressions said to be equivalent to "scope of employment" are "line of duty,"⁸⁸ although it has also been stated that there is a clear distinction between the two expressions,⁸⁹ "course of service,"⁹⁰ "employer's service,"⁹¹ "furtherance of employer's business,"⁹² "prosecution of the master's

c. Nature and Basis of Liability

The liability of a master to a third person for injuries inflicted by a servant in the course of his employment has been stated to be derivative and secondary. The master's liability under the doctrine of respondeat superior has been said to rest on the ground that every man who prefers to manage his affairs through others remains bound so to manage them that third persons are not injured by any breach of legal duty on the part of such others while acting within the scope of their employment.

It has been stated that the liability of a master to a third person for injuries inflicted by a servant in the course of his employment and within the scope of his authority is derivative and secondary,⁹⁶ while that of the servant is primary,⁹⁷ and ordinarily, if there is no liability on the part of the servant, there is none on the part of the master.⁹⁸ On the other hand, it has also been held that the right to sue the employer is not a dependent, but a primary, right,⁹⁹ and that the employer may be held liable even though no recovery against the servant can be had,¹ as where the servant has a personal immunity from suit.²

The master's liability under the doctrine of respondeat superior in part, at least, is founded on the power of control and superintendence over the servant which the master has the right to exercise,³ and it is the master's correlative obligation to see to it that the servant does not commit any torts in the course of his employment,⁴ although it has been stated that theoretically, as well as practically, the master's responsibility extends far beyond his actual or possible control over the conduct of the servant,⁵ and rests on the broader ground that every man who prefers to manage his affairs through others remains bound so to manage them that third persons are not injured by any breach of legal duty on the part of such others while acting within the scope of their employment,⁶ and is dictated by considerations of public policy and the necessity for holding a responsible person liable for the acts done by others in the prosecution of his business, as well as for placing on employers an incentive to hire only careful employees.⁷ It necessarily follows that the act of the servant within the scope of his employment must be considered the act of the master, for which he is liable to the same extent as though he had performed the act in person.⁸

The master's liability is not based on the master's fault,⁹ or on the act of the servant in the master's name¹⁰ or under the color of his employment,¹¹ and exists irrespective of contract.¹²

Doctrine of agency

Doctrine of master's liability for servant's wrongful acts rests on doctrine of agency.—American Sav Life Ins Co v Ripplinger, 60 S.W.2d 115, 249 Ky 8.

Maintenance of social interest in security

"Vicarious liability to third persons is imposed upon the master for his servant's torts because the servant is conducting the master's business, and because the social interest in the general security is best maintained by holding those who conduct enterprises in which others are employed to an absolute liability for what their servants do in the course of the enterprise."

(2) Conduct within Scope of Authority or Employment Generally

While the determination of what conduct is within the scope of a servant's employment or authority is necessarily largely dependent on the facts and circumstances of the particular case, generally whatever is done by the employee in virtue of his employment and in furtherance of its ends is deemed to be within the scope of his employment.

The determination of what conduct of a servant is within the scope of his employment or authority is necessarily largely dependent on the facts and circumstances involved in the particular case in which the question arises,²⁴ and no general rule can be formulated which will determine in each case whether the servant was acting within the scope of his employment.²⁵ Nevertheless, it may be laid down as a general rule that whatever is done by the employee in virtue of his employment and in furtherance of its ends is deemed by the law to be an act done within the scope of his employment,²⁶ and that, in determining whether the servant's conduct was within the scope of his employment, it is proper to inquire whether he was at the time engaged in serving his master.²⁷

It is clear that conduct which the master has specifically directed is within the scope of the servant's employment,²⁸ but it is not essential that the conduct be specially authorized by the master.²⁹ It is enough that it is impliedly directed or authorized by

Servant need not be engaged in direct performance of thing which is ultimate object of employment in order to hold the master liable, since also included within its scope are those acts which incidentally or indirectly contribute to the service—May v Farrell, 271 P. 789, 94 Cal App 703

33. Neb.—Rich v. Dugan, 280 NW 225, 135 Neb 63

Court must consider whether act is commonly done by such servant, whether it is outside the master's enterprise, and, if not, whether it has been entrusted to any servant, whether master has reason to expect act will be done, whether instrumentality used to accomplish act is furnished by master, whether act is criminal, time, place, and purpose of act, previous relation between master and servant, extent to which business is apportioned between servants, similarity of act done to that authorized, and extent of departure from normal method of accomplishing an authorized result.—Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co v Noppenberger, 189 A 434, 171 Md. 378.

The implied powers of one acting as general manager are particularly broad with respect to question whether tort of such employee is within scope of employment.

the duty intrusted to him by the master,³⁴ and accordingly an act is within the scope of a servant's employment where it is reasonably necessary or appropriate to accomplish the purpose of his employment,³⁵ and intended for that purpose,³⁶ although in excess of the powers actually conferred on the servant by the master.³⁷

A servant's failure to perform his duty in the exact manner contemplated by the master does not relieve the latter from liability for the servant's acts.³⁸ So also the act may be within the scope of the employment, although it is not necessary for the proper performance of the servant's duty to his master,³⁹ or although it is not in the interest of the master, or in furtherance of his business,⁴⁰ or although it even may be an obstruction and hindrance to the master's business⁴¹ or is prohibited by statute.⁴² On the other hand, the fact that the act in question was advantageous to, or convenient for, the master, or even effectual in transacting the business in which the master was engaged, is not in itself sufficient to bring the act within the servant's scope of employment.⁴³ A fortiori, an act will not necessarily be considered as within the scope of the servant's employment merely because the injuries complained of would not have been committed without the facilities afforded by the servant's relations to his master,⁴⁴ or merely because the act was committed during the period covered by the servant's employment,⁴⁵ or merely because the servant supposed that he possessed authority to do the act in question⁴⁶ or conceived his conduct to be in the interest of the master.⁴⁷

Absence of authority to do particular act In order to hold the master liable, it is not necessary that the servant should have authority to do the particular act which resulted in the injury complained of,⁴⁸ all that is necessary is that the act be within the scope of the servant's employment.⁴⁹

Contractual relation with person injured In order to render a master liable for injuries inflicted by a servant acting within the scope of his employment, it is not essential that there should be any contractual relation between the master and the person injured⁵⁰

Implied authority to do unlawful act. In some decisions it has been held or said, in effect, that there can be no implied authority to do an act which it would not be lawful under any circumstances for the master himself to do,⁵¹ but this rule does not prevent holding the master liable for the wrongful or excessive exercise of the servant's discretion in a case where the act done would have been lawful if the supposed circumstances had been real⁵²

Infliction of unnecessary injury The master is responsible for a servant's wrongful act if he had authority to do the business in which he was engaged when the act was committed and it was done in the course of his employment, although the servant inflicted unnecessary injury in performing the master's work.⁵³

Insanity or intoxication of servant. Where an act inflicting an injury on a third person is committed by a servant acting within the scope of his authority, the fact that the servant is insane⁵⁴ or that he was intoxicated at the time of inflicting the injury complained of⁵⁵ does not exonerate the master from liability.

Power to prevent act. If the act causing the injury is within the scope of the servant's employment the master is liable although he could not have prevented the act causing the damage⁵⁶

Where it is doubtful whether a servant in injuring a third person was acting within the scope of his authority, it has been said that the doubt will be resolved against the master because he set the servant in motion,⁵⁷ at least to the extent of requiring the question to be submitted to a jury for determination, as discussed infra § 617.

Use of instrumentality The servant may act within the scope of his employment in using an instrumentality not expressly authorized to effect a result which he has been ordered by the master to accomplish where the means to be used are not specified and no other means of obeying the order are available.⁵⁸ The master is not liable, however, where the servant, even in the execution of his general duty, uses an instrumentality not expressly or impliedly authorized by the master,⁵⁹ or which is of a kind substantially different from that authorized,⁶⁰ or over the use of which it is understood the master is to have no right of control.⁶¹ While the master may be held liable for the wrongful act of a servant in the use of an instrumentality which the master has authorized the servant to use even though the master does not own such instrumentality,⁶² the fact that the instrumentality used by the servant is not owned by the master is a fact which may indicate that the use of the instrumentality is not authorized, or, if authorized, that its use is not within the scope of employment,⁶³ and the fact that the master does not own it or has not rented it on such terms that he can direct the manner in which it may be used indicates that the servant is to have a free hand in its use.⁶⁴ In determining whether or not the use of an unauthorized instrumentality is within the scope of the employment, the additional risk from the use is an important fact to be considered.⁶⁵

Surrender of instrumentality to third person. If a servant without authority intrusts an instrumentality to one whom, because of his age, inexperience, or recklessness, he has reason to believe is likely to harm others, it has been held that the master is liable for the resulting harm,⁶⁶ and that the liability of the master may exist not only when the person to whom the instrumentality is intrusted is known to be incompetent or reckless, but, in the case of an

In order to hold a master legally responsible for the act of a servant who is engaged in furthering his master's business and who, while doing so, negligently uses some instrumentality, it must either be proved that the master exercised actual or potential control over that instrumentality or that the use of the instrumentality at the time and place of the act complained of was of such vital importance in furthering the business of the master that the latter's actual or potential control of it may reasonably be inferred—Holdsworth v Pennsylvania Power & Light Co, 10 A 2d 412, 337 Pa 235—Wesolowski v John Hancock Mut Life Ins Co, 162 A 166, 308 Pa 117, 87 ALR 783, followed in 162 A 168, 308 Pa 123—Koscelek v. instrumentality likely to do harm if not carefully managed, the master is liable when the servant intrusts the instrumentality to a person whose qualifications the servant does not know.⁶⁷ Moreover, it has been held that a servant, while remaining with an instrumentality belonging to his master, may surrender its immediate control to another, and although such surrender is not negligent, the master remains subject to liability for any negligence of his servant in supervising the third person's conduct.⁶⁸

(3) Time of Service

Conduct of a servant is within the scope of his employment only when it occurs substantially within authorized time limits or during a period not unreasonably disconnected from the authorized period.

Conduct of a servant is within the scope of his employment only when it occurs substantially within authorized time limits or during a period which is not unreasonably disconnected from the authorized period.⁶⁹ Ordinarily the master will not be liable if the act resulting in the injury is committed by the servant at a time when he is off duty,⁷⁰ as, for instance, after the day's work is completed,⁷¹ or at a free hour,⁷² or while taking time away from his work for meals,⁷³ or where the servant has been given a holiday,⁷⁴ and it has been held that this is true although the act is one which, if done by the servant while on duty and at a time when actually engaged in the master's service, would be within the course and scope of his usual and ordinary duties.⁷⁵ It has been held, however, that cessation of work for eating, drinking, and similar necessities is a necessary incident of employment, and that an employee so engaged does not necessarily sever his relation from his work so as to relieve his master of liability for his acts,⁷⁶ and that the master's liability is not limited to acts occurring during actual working time.⁷⁷ The mere fact that an act, which is otherwise within a servant's scope of employment, is performed at a time before the servant ordinarily goes to work will not exonerate the master of liability therefor.⁷⁸

(4) Area of Service

Conduct of a servant is within the scope of his employment only when it occurs in a locality not unreasonably distant from the area in which he is authorized to perform his duties, and ordinarily the employer is not responsible for the acts of his employees while going to, or returning from, their place of employment.

Conduct of a servant is within the scope of his employment only when it occurs substantially within authorized space limits, that is, in a locality not unreasonably distant from the area in which he is authorized to perform his duties.⁷⁹ Generally an employee going to and from his place of employment is not acting within the scope of his employment.⁸⁰ This rule is, however, subject to exceptions,⁸¹ and an employee may be regarded as acting within the scope of his employment while going to, or returning from, his place of work where the em-

ployee's compensation covers the time involved in going or returning,⁸² or the employer furnishes the transportation,⁸³ or an allowance is made for the cost of transportation,⁸⁴ or there are circumstances disclosing that the interests of the master are being served,⁸⁵ or that the master controls, or has the right to control, the conduct of the servant.⁸⁶ Where the employment itself is one in which an employee is required to travel from place to place at the employer's will, the risks of such travel are directly incident to the employment, and the employer may be held liable therefor.⁸⁷ An employee going on a mission or errand for his employer does not cease to act in the course or scope of his employment when starting on the return trip.⁸⁸

(5) Intent or Motive of Servant

While it has been held that the liability of the master for the servant's acts is not affected by the intention or motive with which the servant committed the act, it has also been recognized that the intention with which an act is performed is material in determining whether it is within the scope of his employment.

Mo—Brunk v Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co, 66 S.W.2d 903, 334 Mo. 517.

In a number of decisions it has been held or stated that, where a third person sustains injury from the act of a servant done in the course of his employment, the intention or motive with which the servant committed the act does not in any way affect the master's liability,⁸⁹ although it may have some effect in determining the amount of damages.⁹⁰ Conversely, it has been held that, if the act was outside of the scope of the servant's employment, the fact that the act was intended to promote the interest of the master will not render him liable.⁹¹ Nevertheless it has also been recognized that the intention with which an act was done by a servant is material in determining whether the act was within the scope of his employment,⁹² or for some purpose of his own having no relation to his employment,⁹³ and this is true even though the act of the servant was in disobedience of orders and instructions.⁹⁴ Thus an act of a servant has been held not to be within the scope of his employment if it is done with no intention to perform it as a part of, or incident to, a service he is employed to perform,⁹⁵ and that, in order to be considered within the scope of employment, the servant's act must be actuated at least in part by a purpose to serve the master.⁹⁶ An act may be within the scope of the servant's employment even though the predominant motive is to benefit himself, as discussed infra § 574, or a third person.⁹⁷ On the other hand, the mere fact that the act is done by the servant with the intention of serving the master is not of itself sufficient to bring the act within the scope of his employment.⁹⁸

(6) Knowledge or Assent of Master

If an act or omission occurs in the course of a servant's employment and within its scope, the master is liable therefor although he had no knowledge thereof.

The master's liability is not limited to cases where he is present and remains passive.⁹⁹ If an act or omission, resulting in the injury complained of, occurs in the course of a servant's employment and within its scope, the master is liable therefor although he has no knowledge thereof¹ or although the manner of doing the act was without his knowledge or assent.²

A servant's scope of employment, as it affects the master's liability for the servant's acts, is determined not only by what the servant is employed to perform, as discussed supra subdivision d (2) of this section, but also by what the servant does actually perform with the knowledge and approval of his master.³

Imputation of servant's knowledge to master. A master is affected with constructive knowledge, regardless of his actual knowledge, of all material facts of which his servant receives notice or acquires knowledge while acting in the course of his employment and within its scope, although the servant does not in fact inform his master thereof.⁴

On the other hand, a servant's knowledge of a matter which is outside the scope of his employment or not related to its purpose is not imputed to the master.⁵

(7) Acts Unnecessary to Performance of Duty

The master is responsible for acts within the scope of a servant's employment although not necessary for the proper performance of his duty.

Where the act complained of was done within the scope of the servant's employment, the master will be responsible although the servant's act was not necessary for the proper performance of his duty.⁶ The liability of the master is not limited to the result of acts done by the servant in the proper performance of his duties.⁷

(8) Acts in Excess or Abuse of Authority

If the act complained of was within the scope of the servant's authority, the master will be liable although it constituted an abuse or excess of the authority conferred.

If the act complained of was within the scope of the servant's authority, the master will be liable although it constituted an abuse or excess of the authority conferred,⁸ especially where the master

knows or should know that such act is likely to be performed and that damage to others is likely to result.⁹ The master who puts the servant in a place of trust or responsibility, or commits to him the management of his business or the care of his property, is justly held responsible when the servant, through lack of judgment or discretion, or from infirmity of temper, or under the influence of passion aroused by the circumstances and the occasion, goes beyond the strict line of his duty or authority and inflicts an unjustifiable injury on a third person.¹⁰ The master is not liable, however, if authority to perform the act complained of is totally lacking.¹¹

If the act resulting in the injury was within the scope of the servant's employment, the master will be liable therefor, although the act was in violation of his instructions or orders, but if a forbidden act is outside the class of service which the servant is employed to perform the act is outside the scope of employment and ordinarily no liability attaches to the master.

know that such act is likely to be performed and that damage to others is likely to result.¹⁴ The test of the master's responsibility for the acts of his servants is not whether such act was done in accordance with the instructions of the master to the servant, but whether it was done in the prosecution of the business that the servant was employed to do,¹⁵ and an act is regarded as "authorized" in the legal sense if it is incidental to the performance of the duties intrusted to the servant even though it is in disobedience of the master's express orders and instructions.¹⁶ If the master undertakes to determine for himself the manner in which his servant shall perform his prescribed duties, the obligation is on him to see that such instructions are carried out and that the servant does not substitute his own methods for those of his master.¹⁷ Any other rule, it has been said, would in a measure nullify the doctrine of respondeat superior.¹⁸ The rule, of course, does not apply where the injury was the result of arrangements made by the person injured with the servant, with knowledge that they were in contravention of prior orders from the master.¹⁹

As determinative of scope of employment. The fact that a servant disobeys the orders or instructions of his master in doing the act complained of is not determinative of whether he acted within the scope of his employment,²⁰ it is well settled that such act may be within the scope of the servant's employment although in violation of the express instructions or orders of the master.²¹ If, however, the act forbidden is outside the class of service which the servant is employed to perform, the doing of the act is outside the scope of employment and no liability attaches to the master²² unless the rule forbidding the act has been openly, constantly, and habitually violated for such a length of time that the master in the exercise of ordinary care should have been apprised and informed of its non-observance²³. The fact that a servant is at a place where he should not be, if he had obeyed his master's orders, is immaterial except as it tends to show a permanent or temporary abandonment of his master's service.²⁴

e. Exceptions to Rule

- (1) In general
- (2) Dangerous instrumentalities or agencies

(1) In General

The rule that the master is liable only for acts committed by his servant within the scope of employment is subject to some apparent exceptions.

There are some apparent exceptions to the general rule, discussed supra subdivisions a-d of this section, that the master is liable for torts of the servant if, and only if, they are committed by him while acting within the scope of his employment.²⁵ They grow out of the duty owing by the master to the person injured,²⁶ and the master is liable for acts of his servant which he has contracted against even though such acts are outside the scope of the servant's employment.²⁷

Servant of storekeeper. It has been held that a shopkeeper or storekeeper, who invites the public to enter his premises and to subject themselves to the custody and control of his employees, is liable for injuries inflicted by them, even though not within the scope of their employment,²⁸ but other decisions do not recognize this exception²⁹.

Acts for which master not liable if done by himself. It has been held that the master is not liable for any act of his servant for which he would not have been liable if he had done it himself³⁰.

(2) Dangerous Instrumentalities or Agencies

In some jurisdictions it has been held that a master who intrusts the custody, control, and use of any dangerous instrumentality or agency to a servant will not be permitted to avoid liability for injuries inflicted thereby on the ground that the servant in doing the particular act complained of was acting outside the scope of his employment.

In some jurisdictions, it has been held that a master who intrusts the custody, control, and use of any dangerous instrumentality or agency to a servant will not be permitted to avoid responsibility for injuries inflicted thereby through the act of the servant on the ground that the servant in doing the particular act complained of was acting outside of the scope of his employment³¹. This is on the theory that persons using dangerous instrumentalities in the prosecution of their business must observe the greatest care in the custody and use thereof,³² that this duty cannot be shifted by the master from himself to his servants so as to exonerate him from liability for their negligence in the custody and use thereof,³³ and that, when these instrumentalities are so intrusted to a servant by the master, the proper custody and use thereof becomes a part of the servant's employment,³⁴ and he must use the same degree of care and attention as the law requires of the master.³⁵

Extent and limits of rule. This doctrine, it has been said, applies not to those instrumentalities alone which are dangerous per se or which are operated or propelled by the power of steam, electricity, powder, dynamite, or kindred forces, but to all instrumentalities employed by the master which, by reason of the method of their operation, are capable of inflicting, and likely to inflict, serious injury on others.³⁶ Some authorities have limited the application of the doctrine to cases where the injury results from the servant's failure to guard a dangerous instrumentality and have refused to apply the rule so as to impose liability on the master where the injury results from the positive personal wrong of the servant.³⁷

Torpedoes The rule has been applied where a servant in charge of torpedoes used by the master in his business inflicts injury on another by his negligent use thereof³⁸ or where injuries are inflicted on another when the torpedoes are being used by the servant for his own amusement or to play a joke.³⁹ However, it has been held that the doctrine has no application where the servant inflicting the injuries by the use of torpedoes was not intrusted with the custody and use thereof and at the time of the injury was not acting in furtherance of the master's interest.⁴⁰

Under the doctrine of respondeat superior the master is liable for the negligent acts or omissions of his servant while acting as such within the scope of his authority

Ground of liability

(1) It has been stated that the liability of the master for his servant's negligence is predicated on the fact that the employee during the performance of his duties is presumably acting under the control of his employer—McCready v National Starch Products, 23 A.2d 108, 2 Terry, Del., 392.

(2) It has also been stated that it is based on the ground that one who does a thing by and through another does it himself and is responsible for manner in which it is done—Stith v J. J. Newberry Co, 79 S.W.2d 447, 388 Mo 487.

(3) On the other hand, it has been stated that the master's liability is not that servant represents master in the negligent act, but that he is conducting affairs of master who must see that they are conducted without injury to others—P. F. Collier & Son Distributing Corporation v Drinkwater, C.C.A.N.C., 81 F.2d 300

(4) Other statements see 39 C.J. p 1289 note 54 [a].

When servant is engaged in work of master, doing that which servant is employed or directed to do, and an actionable wrong is negligently done to another, master is liable, not only for what servant does, but also for ways and means employed by servant in performing act in question—Long v Eagle 5, 10 and 25; Store Co, 198 S.E. 573, 314 N.C. 146—Robertson v Virginia Electric & Power Co, 168 S.E. 415, 204 N.C. 359, cause remanded 170 S.E. 139, 205 N.C. 111—Dickerson v Atlantic Refining Co, 159 S.E. 446, 201 N.C. 90

Damages reasonably anticipated

The employer is liable for any damage that he might reasonably have anticipated would result from the employee's negligence—Ritz v Cousins Lumber Co, 59 S.W.2d 1072, 227 Mo App 1167.

Concurrent negligence of third person

The fact that the negligence of a third person other than that of the person injured cooperated with that of the servant in inflicting the injury will not exonerate the master from liability where the act was within the scope of the servant's employment—Yashar v Yakovac, 48 N.Y.S.2d 128

Incidental acts

The mere fact that the injury complained of was caused by the negligence of the servant in the performance of an act which, taken per se, was within the scope of his employment, it has been held will not impose liability on the master, if the act was merely incidental to the servant's attempt to perform an act entirely beyond the scope of his au-

the right or power to control the servant in the performance of the act which caused the injury⁵² Whether or not a certain course of conduct by a servant is negligent, or the exercise of reasonable care, must be determined by the standards fixed by law, without regard to any private rules of the master regulating the conduct of his servant⁵³ The master may be held liable even though he has taken every precaution in selecting and instructing the servant,⁵⁴ and it is immaterial, as affecting the master's liability, what the motive of the servant was⁵⁵ It is not essential to the master's liability that the negligent act or omission complained of should have been expressly authorized by him,⁵⁶ or that he should have been present when the act or omission complained of was committed,⁵⁷ or that he should have had knowledge of the act or omission which caused the injury⁵⁸ Indeed, as long as the act is within the scope of the servant's employment, the master may be held liable even though he disapproved or forbade it⁵⁹ The fact that he had delegated to a third person the power to give the servant instructions as to his work will not exonerate the master from liability.⁶⁰

Limitation of rule; charitable work It has been held that, while an employee engaged in doing charitable work for the master may be regarded as acting in the furtherance of his master's business and to further his purposes, the rule of respondeat superior does not extend to his negligence in so doing, resulting in injury to one who is a recipient of the master's charity.⁶¹

The law is applied more strictly in negligence cases, where it is sought to hold master liable for servant's act, than in workmen's compensation cases—Cunningham v Union Chevrolet Co, supra.

Knowledge of presence of injured person

Contributory negligence. Plaintiff cannot recover, although defendant's servant was negligent in the scope of his employment, if plaintiff himself was guilty of contributory negligence⁶² and the doctrine of "last clear chance" is not involved⁶³. Consent of plaintiff to the absence of the servant, where he failed to return as he had promised, which failure was the cause of the injury, has been held not to relieve the master of liability.⁶⁴

§ 572. — Willful or Malicious Acts

As a general rule a master may be held liable for the willful or malicious acts of his servant done in the course of employment and within its scope.

Although there is some early authority to the contrary,⁶⁵ it is well settled that the master may be held liable for the willful or malicious acts of the servant done in the course of his employment and within its scope,⁶⁶ although the acts were not con-

What constitutes contributory negligence

The determination of whether plaintiff is barred by contributory negligence from recovering depends on whether a reasonably prudent man, situated as was plaintiff, seeing what he saw and knowing what he knew, would have acted as he acted, and whether such conduct constituted care in proportion to the danger—Wallace v King, 80 P 2d 523, 27 Cal App 2d 174

sent to, or expressly ratified or authorized by, the master.⁶⁷ Such acts are imputable to the master under the doctrine of respondeat superior.⁶⁸

It has been stated that the decisions holding that the willful or malicious tort of the servant may be imputed to the master fall into three classes.⁶⁹ (1) Where the master is under contract, express or implied, with the person wronged, or under a law-imposed duty, requiring the master to refrain from mistreatment of him.⁷⁰ (2) Where the nature of the employment or the duty imposed on the servant is such that the master must contemplate the use of force by the servant in performance as a natural or legitimate sequence.⁷¹ (3) Where a dangerous instrumentality is intrusted by the master to the servant, which has capability of harm to the public.⁷² While it has been recognized that other cases may arise which would call for a distinct classification,⁷³ it has been held that ordinarily the master is not liable if the case does not fall within one of these three classes.⁷⁴

The master may be held liable for a willful or malicious act of his servant even though he had no knowledge that the act was to be done,⁷⁵ and, in accordance with general principles heretofore discussed, the master will be liable, although the acts were in disobedience of express orders or instructions given by him,⁷⁶ or although the particular act complained of may have been in excess of the servant's authority,⁷⁷ and regardless of the motive or intention of the servant.⁷⁸ It has been held, however, that, if the nature of the act is such as to render it doubtful if the act comes within the scope of the servant's employment, the intention with which the act is done may be considered in determining its character.⁷⁹

Not within scope of employment In accordance with general principles considered supra § 570, the master is not liable for the willful and malicious acts of the servant committed outside the scope of his employment.⁸⁰ This is true even though the acts in question are committed in the course of the employment⁸¹ or the employment furnishes the opportunity for the wrongdoing.⁸² Nevertheless, it has been held that the general rule that a master is not liable for a malicious act of his servant, not done within the scope of his employment, does not relieve the master from his own neglect to use reasonable means to prevent a dangerous practice carried on by workmen under his control and on his premises.⁸³

§ 573. — Criminal Acts

It has generally been held that a master may be liable in damages because of the criminal acts of his servant where such acts can be said to be within the scope of the servant's employment.

It has generally been held that where the relation of master and servant actually exists, under the respondeat superior doctrine a master may be liable in damages because of the criminal acts of his servant, where such acts can be said to be within the scope of the servant's employment.⁸⁴ On the other

Criminal liability of master for acts of employee see Criminal Law § 84

Employer is liable for unlawful killing which employee knowingly aided and abetted during arrest authorized by employer—Great Southern Lumber Co v Williams, CCA La, 17 F 2d 468, certiorari denied 48 S Ct 19, 275 US 511, 72 L Ed 399, affirmed 48 S Ct 417, 277 US 19, 72 L Ed 761

Where dealer's clerk unlawfully sold cartridges to minor and accidental discharge of cartridges from pistol killed plaintiff's intestate, store owner would be liable—Driesse v Verblaauw, 153 A 388, 9 NJ Misc 173.

Liability to employer's principal for felony

Fact that unfaithfulness of employee in committing a wrong may amount to a felony does not alter obligation of employer to employer's principal as long as the employee is acting within the scope of his employment—Transcontinental & Western Air v Bank of America N. T. & S. A., 116 F.2d 791, 46 Cal App.2d 708

In Texas

(1) It has been broadly stated that "A trespass committed by a servant while acting in the course of his employment is imputable to the master in the law of negligence, regardless of whether the wrongful act of the servant may or may not also amount to a criminal offense"—Texas Farm Products Co v Johnson, Tex Civ App, 190 SW 2d 178, 180

(2) A fuller statement of the master's liability for the criminal acts of his servant is that "if in performing any duty within the line of his employment the servant uses unnecessary force in doing an act lawful within itself, and thereby commits a trespass or a crime, then the act may be deemed one for which the master is civilly responsible, but if the act be in itself illegal, however performed, or by whomsoever done, then the master ought not be held liable, unless he advised, or in some way participated in, the unlawful act"—Dillingham v Russell, 11 SW 139, 142, 78 Tex 47, 15 Am SR 753, 3 LRA 634

(3) It has been held that the liability of the master cannot be based on a criminal act, such as violation of a statute requiring lighting of a motor vehicle when in operation at night, unless the master was a party to the crime or offense either as an accomplice or otherwise—Brown v Calhoun, Tex Civ App, 22 SW 2d 757
85. Ky—Brooks v Gray-Von Allen Sanitary Milk Co, 277 SW 816, 211 Ky 462, 46 ALR 1207—Bray-Robinson Clothing Co v Huggins, 276 SW 129, 210 Ky 432

mentalities are being used by the servant for the purpose of advancing the employer's business or interests.² This is true even though the facilities or instrumentalities causing the injury were used with the consent of the master³ or were maintained by the master entirely for the use of the servant,⁴ and it has been held that the fact that the facilities furnished were dangerous by reason of defects therein is immaterial.⁵

c. Mischievous Acts for Amusement

If the servant does an act merely to frighten a third person or an animal or to perpetrate a joke on a third person, and the act is entirely disconnected from the purpose of the employment, the master is generally not liable therefor.

If the servant does an act merely to frighten a third person or an animal⁶ or to perpetrate a joke on a third person,⁷ and the act is entirely disconnected from the purpose of the employment, the master generally is not liable therefor. The master may be held liable, however, if the act of the servant in perpetrating a joke is not entirely disconnected from the purposes of his employment,⁸ and it has been held that the act of a servant in charge of an engine in blowing off steam or hot water or whis-

d. Deviation or Departure from Service

- (1) In general
- (2) While engaged in master's business notwithstanding deviation
- (3) Resumption of master's work after deviation

(1) In General

In order to relieve a master from liability for his servant's acts, on the ground that the servant had deviated from his service, the deviation must be so substantial as to amount to an entire departure therefrom and be for purposes entirely personal to the servant.

The mere deviation or departure by a servant from the strict course of duty, although for a purpose of his own, does not in and of itself constitute such a departure from the master's business as to release him from liability for injuries inflicted by the act of the servant.¹⁰ The liability of the master depends on the degree of deviation and all the attendant circumstances.¹¹ A slight deviation by the servant will not release the master from liability.¹²

In order to relieve a master from liability for the servant's acts on the ground that the servant had deviated from his service, the deviation must be so substantial as to amount to an entire departure therefrom and be for purposes entirely personal to the servant.¹³ Nevertheless, if the servant totally departs from the master's business for a purpose exclusively his own, the master is not liable for his acts.¹⁴

(2) While Engaged in Master's Business
notwithstanding Deviation

Where the servant is, notwithstanding a deviation, engaged in the master's business within the scope of his employment, it is immaterial, with respect to the master's liability, that he joined with this some private purpose of his own

Since in order to exonerate the master from liability it is essential that the deviation or departure should be for purposes entirely personal to the servant, as discussed supra subdivision d (1) of this section, where the servant is, notwithstanding the deviation, engaged in the master's business within the scope of his employment it is immaterial that he joined with this some private business or purpose of his own.¹⁵ The fact that the servant's predominant ditions which then existed have not been altered by the act of the servant so that some new negligent cause has intervened for which the master was not originally liable.²¹ There is some conflict in the authorities as to when a servant will be deemed to have returned to his employment after a deviation therefrom for a purpose of his own.²² According to some authorities the servant will be considered to have resumed the prosecution of the master's business where, after the fulfillment of his own purpose, he is returning to resume his duties.²³ It has been held, however, that the mere fact that a servant has completed the purpose for which he departed from his master's business and is returning to resume the duties of his employment will not operate to restore the relationship of master and servant so as to impose liability on the master²⁴ and that a servant cannot reenter the scope of his employment until he is within the flexible limits of his employment.²⁵ While it has been held that it is not necessary for him to have reached the zone of his employment or the territory in which he was employed to work,²⁶ or the point from which he diverged when beginning to act for a purpose of his own,²⁷ or his des-

tinuation,²⁸ it has also been held that a servant ordinarily will not be deemed to have returned to his master's service until he at least has reached a point in a zone within which his labors would have been consistent with an act of deviation merely,²⁹ and other authorities have held that the relation of master and servant is not restored until the servant has returned to the place where the deviation occurred or to a corresponding place, some place where, in the performance of his duty, he should be.³⁰ In any case, it has been said to be clearly impossible to formulate a general rule governing all cases, and whether there has been a resumption of the master's business must of necessity depend largely on the facts of the particular case.³¹

Such resumption of the master's business cannot be effected merely by the mental attitude of the servant.³² There must be that attitude coupled with a reasonable connection in time and space with the work in which he should be engaged,³³ and it has been held that there can be no resumption of the relation which has been suspended while the servant is still primarily bent on the accomplishment of his personal undertaking.³⁴

§ 575. — Particular Application of Respondeat Superior Doctrine

- a. In general
- b. Fires started by servant
- c. Injuries to invitees, licensees, and trespassers
- d. Negligent or willful use of master's horses or vehicles
- e. Obstruction of highways and streams
- f. Trespass

a. In General

The doctrine of respondeat superior should be liberally and practically applied, but it should not be applied in such a manner as to destroy the rights of the master.

It has been declared that the rule imposing liability on the master for the acts of his servant is to be liberally and practically applied, especially where

the business of the master, intrusted to the servant, involves a duty owed by him to the public or to third persons.³⁵ In addition to other particular applications, hereinafter considered, a wide variety of acts or omissions has been held to fall within the scope of employment of particular servants so as to impose liability therefor on the master,³⁶ including the servant's deceit or fraud,³⁷ negligence in the maintenance of the floors and stairways on the master's premises,³⁸ in leaving an inherently dangerous instrument where it could injure others,³⁹ in leaving open trap doors, coalholes, or like contrivances,⁴⁰ in discharging firearms,⁴¹ or in substituting another to perform his duties;⁴² mistake in filling a prescription,⁴³ pollution of milk delivered to a customer,⁴⁴ setting up machinery in a defective manner⁴⁵ or failing to test it properly after setting it up,⁴⁶ violation of the Civil Rights Law,⁴⁷ creation

§ 575. — Particular Application of Respondent Superior Doctrine

- a. In general
- b. Fires started by servant
- c. Injuries to invitees, licensees, and trespassers
- d. Negligent or willful use of master's horses or vehicles
- e. Obstruction of highways and streams
- f. Trespass

a. In General

The doctrine of respondent superior should be liberally and practically applied, but it should not be applied in such a manner as to destroy the rights of the master.

It has been declared that the rule imposing liability on the master for the acts of his servant is to be liberally and practically applied, especially where

the business of the master, intrusted to the servant, involves a duty owed by him to the public or to third persons³⁵ In addition to other particular applications, hereinafter considered, a wide variety of acts or omissions has been held to fall within the scope of employment of particular servants so as to impose liability therefor on the master,³⁶ including the servant's deceit or fraud,³⁷ negligence in the maintenance of the floors and stairways on the master's premises,³⁸ in leaving an inherently dangerous instrument where it could injure others,³⁹ in leaving open trap doors, coalholes, or like contrivances,⁴⁰ in discharging firearms,⁴¹ or in substituting another to perform his duties,⁴² mistake in filling a prescription,⁴³ pollution of milk delivered to a customer,⁴⁴ setting up machinery in a defective manner⁴⁵ or failing to test it properly after setting it up,⁴⁶ violation of the Civil Rights Law,⁴⁷ creation

On the other hand, the doctrine of respondeat superior should not be applied so as to destroy the rights of the master,⁵⁰ and a variety of conduct has been held to be outside the scope of employment of particular servants so as to relieve the master of liability to third persons for injuries resulting therefrom.⁵¹ Thus, the master was held not liable where his employees, instead of putting wire used for repair in a safe place, connected it with a wire charged with electricity with the avowed intention of injuring thieves,⁵² where servants engaged in running a steamboat used to carry persons to a railway, both steamboat and railway being owned by the same person, mismanaged the railway so as to cause injuries to third persons, nothing being shown as to any authority or right on their part to operate the railway,⁵³ or where the servant, while not acting within the real or apparent scope of his authority, used abusive and insulting language to one on the master's premises.⁵⁴

Barbering and beauty culture The owner of a beauty or barber shop is liable to a customer for injuries received due to the negligence of his servants while acting within the scope of their employment.⁵⁵

Conversion. If a servant, while acting within the scope of his employment and in the discharge of his duty, wrongfully converts the property of a third person, the master is liable therefor.⁵⁶ On the other hand, the master is not liable for the conversion by his servant of another's property where he was acting outside of the scope of his employment.⁵⁷

Injuries to, or killing of, animals. The master is ordinarily liable for the killing of, or injury to, an animal by a servant, in the ordinary prosecution and scope of his employment,⁵⁸ but a master is not liable for the act of his servant outside the scope of his employment,⁵⁹ unless such servant has acted under the command or direction of his master.⁶⁰

Negligent pedestrianism. It has been held that the master is liable for an injury to the person or property of another caused by the negligent pedestrianism of his servant who is otherwise acting within the scope of his employment⁶¹

Selling explosives to infant. As discussed in Explosives § 6 c, if one sells gunpowder or other explosives to children, or to others whom he knows to be incapable of taking proper care of them, he is liable for injuries resulting from their improper use by such persons. Such liability extends to sales made by a servant acting within the scope of his employment,⁶² and the master is not exonerated from liability by reason of the fact that the sale was made in violation of the master's instructions⁶³

Where, in doing the master's work, the use of fire is necessary or greatly facilitates the performance of the work, the use thereof will be considered as being within the scope of the servant's employment so as to render the master liable for injuries to third persons by reason of the servant's negligence in the use thereof, but, generally, the master is not liable for injuries resulting from fires started by a servant merely to serve his own purposes.

Where, in doing the master's work, the use of fire is necessary or greatly facilitates the performance of the work, the use thereof will be considered as being within the scope of the servant's employment so as to render the master liable if a third person is injured or his property is destroyed by reason of the negligence of the servant in the use thereof,⁶⁴ and this is true, although the servant may have violated the master's instructions as to how to use it,⁶⁵ or may have acted in disobedience of the master's orders to use it at all,⁶⁶ but there is authority apparently to the contrary of this last proposition.⁶⁷ If the master has directed the servant to start a fire, he cannot exonerate himself from responsibility by showing that his instructions were not strictly followed by the servant.⁶⁸

In Missouri

(1) Where a messenger, while delivering a message for his master or otherwise acting within the scope of his employment, negligently collides with a pedestrian on a public street, it has been held that the master cannot be held liable for the pedestrian's injuries under the doctrine of respondeat superior, since the messenger was not traveling on the street by permission of the master but was merely exercising a public right valuable to himself as a facility for gaining a livelihood—Phillips v Western Union Telegraph Company, 195 SW 711, 270 Mo 678—Ritchey v Western Union Telegraph Co, 41 SW 2d 623, 227 Mo App 754

(2) In a later case, however, it was held that a master distributing material to customers by route boys, one of whom negligently pushed revolving door constituting only entrance to customer's business office against person attempting to leave such office as he entered it to make delivery, would be liable for such person's injuries in absence of contributory negligence, the court distinguishing Phillips v Western Union Telegraph Company, supra, from the case at bar in that in the case at bar the accident did not occur on the public street, the route boy was not using merely his health and strength, and had not in any way departed from the scope of his employment—Salmons v Dun & Bradstreet, 163 SW 2d 245, 349 Mo 498, 141 A L R 674

Where twelve-year-old child was burned while standing by fire which had been built by workmen acting within the scope of their employment, failure of workmen to keep child away from fire was held not actionable negligence, since a fire is ipso facto dangerous—Hancock v Aiken Mills, 185 SE 188, 180 SC 98.

On the other hand, as a general rule, the master is not liable for injuries from fires started by the servant merely to serve his own purposes and having no connection with the master's work.⁶⁹ Such is not the rule, however, where it is one of the duties pertaining to the servant's employment to extinguish fires found on the master's premises irrespective of how they were started so that they would not extend to and injure the property of others.⁷⁰

Fires started by smoking. The courts have generally refused recovery in an action against an employer where the person or property of a third person is injured by a servant smoking,⁷¹ especially where the injury occurs at a time when the servant is not otherwise acting within the scope of his employment or serving the interests of his master,⁷² or the smoking takes place in surroundings where it could not reasonably be anticipated that damage would result.⁷³ The master has been held liable, however, where the servant at the time the injury occurred was combining smoking and his master's business,⁷⁴ and, although there is authority to the contrary,⁷⁵ it has been held that, where the master sends out servants to do work, the nature of which is such that the master knows that damage is likely to occur if his servants smoke, the duty devolves on the master to see that his servants exercise due care under the existing circumstances and he is liable for the damages caused by their smoking.⁷⁶

It has been held that an employer is not liable for an injury, caused by his employee's conduct, or otherwise, to one accepting or soliciting from the employee an invitation, not known to, or binding on, the employer, to enter or remain on the employer's premises, even though the conduct which immediately causes the harm is within the scope of the servant's employment, although there is also authority to the contrary.

The owner, occupant, or person in charge of property owes to an invitee the duty of exercising reasonable or ordinary care for his safety, and is liable for injury resulting from a breach of such duty, as discussed in the C.J.S. title Negligence § 45, also 45 C.J. p 824 note 50, p 825 note 51. This rule includes within its protection persons invited on the premises by the owner's or occupant's servant where the invitation is within the scope of his employment,⁷⁷ and it operates to protect invitees of

It has been held that the negligence of a garage foreman in dropping a burning match, after lighting a cigarette, on ground saturated with gasoline from the tank of an overturned automobile was not related to supervision of efforts to get automobile out of ditch which garage owner had requested him to do, and hence garage owner was not liable for burning of automobile, regardless of whether owner knew foreman smoked while working, where owner could not anticipate spilled gasoline
